The gruesome lynching of the dying Haftom was totally ugly, totally detestable. It could lead one to despair of Israel – If it were not for one anonymous middle-aged bystander, who returned to the scene two days later, retelling the story on TV, admitting that he could not sleep since then – and weeping.

A new chapter has opened in the battle against terrorism. The ISIS-inspired attack in San Bernardino on US ground and the staggering deadly attacks in Paris now threaten daily life in the homeland, for our closest allies, and beyond, following strikes against Russia, Africa, the Middle East, and recent threats against Belgium and Italy. The threat of terrorism feels closer to home than it has at any time since 9/11.

There are many battlefronts for this war on terrorism and Malcolm Nance, a career intelligence officer and expert on international terrorism, intelligence, insurgency and torture, has deep knowledge about these opponents. Mr. Nance will discuss the goals and motivations of ISIS and similar groups, and how best to fight them here and abroad. He is internationally recognized for his expertise in the history, personalities, and organization of al Qaeda and its affiliates, including the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS); jihadi radicalization, Islamic extremism in Middle East, Southwest Asian and African terror groups, as well as counterinsurgency and asymmetric warfare.

The rise of ISIS is currently tied in large measure to its grounding in parts of Syria and Iraq. To discuss the options in these areas, we will present Ribal al-Assad, an important Syrian opposition leader in exile, who has been leading a global campaign for democracy, human rights, and freedom for Syria. Mr. al-Assad will offer his insights about possible outcomes for the Syrian conflict; what the military, diplomatic and political options might be; how likely they are to come to pass; and what role the US and its allies should play to help end the conflict.

	8-28-08 TPs VP Records.docx

With news that McCain is expected to announce his VP tomorrow we have produced a scorecard showing how the top VP choices offer more of the same failed Bush and McCain policies.

We will be working hard on framing these choices as more of the same. This is our general research on each candidate. As your organizations work on push back please contact us if you need any more information on any of he choices or any of the issues.

VP SCORECARD

All VP candidates get an A+ on being the same as Bush and McCain

	John McCain	Mitt Romney	Tim Pawlenty	Eric Cantor	Rob Portman	John Thune
Supports Bush War in Iraq	X	X	X	X	X	X
Supports Bush Tax Cuts for Millionaires	X	X	X	X	X	X
Supports Bush Fight Against Children's Healthcare	X	X	X	X	X	X
Supports Bush Outsourcing, Anti-Worker Policies	X	X	X	X	X	X
Supports Bush Anti-Choice Policies	X	X	X	X	X	X

MCCAIN VP CHOICES ALL HAVE "PERFECT RECORDS" SUPPORTING BUSH POLICIES

No matter who John McCain picks as his Vice Presidential running mate they will offer more of the same failed Bush policies of the last eight years. Across all issues from health care to the economy to the war in Iraq, McCain's VP choices, "measure for measure," have perfect records supporting same failed policies as Bush.

John Thune A+ Record on Supporting Failed Bush Policies

Thune, Like McCain, Backed Bush's Iraq Policy

Thune on Iraq:

"I Think We Do Need To Stay The Course." [CBS, "Face the Nation," 12/26/04, emphasis added]

Mitt Romney A+ Record on Supporting Failed Bush Policies

"I wouldn't presume to present a plan different than that of the president."
--Mitt Romney [Fox News, 9/19/06]

Like Bush, Romney Vowed To Veto Health Care For Children

"I'd veto it out of my belief that we should have every citizen insured. I put forward a plan in my state that gets every citizen insured….The right pathway to get everybody insured is to help people get private insurance. The SCHIP pathway is simply the wrong way." [Kansas City Star, 10/01/07]

Rob Portman A+ Record, "Real Commitment" on Supporting Failed Bush Policies

"I have a loyalty and allegiance to making [The Bush Administration] successful. I have a real commitment to that."
-- Rob Portman [The Cincinnati Enquirer, 3/18/05]

Portman Supported Bush An Average Of 94 Percent Per Year. During the four years he served in the House of Representatives during Bush's presidency, Portman almost always voted with the president. On average, he supported Bush 94.25 percent of the time during a given year. [CQ Voting Studies, accessed 7/29/08]

Portman, Like Bush and McCain, Wants To Privatize Social Security

Portman on His Vote to Privatize Social Security:

- "What We're Talking About Is Letting Individuals Save A Little Bit Of Their Hard Earned Money For Themselves." [Fox News, "The O'Reilly Factor," 6/18/01]

Portman, Like McCain, Repeated The Bush Administration's False Justifications For War.

Portman Claimed Iraq Was "Seeking Yellow Cake, Seeking Enriched Uranium For A Nuclear Weapons Program." [MSNBC, "Hardball," 7/24/03]

- Bush: "Saddam Hussein Recently Sought Significant Quantities Of Uranium From Africa." [2003 State of the Union, 1/28/03]
- The White House Retracted Uranium Claims More Than Two Weeks Before Portman Repeated Them. [Associated Press, 7/8/03]

Tim Pawlenty A+ Record on Supporting Failed Bush Policies

Toeing The (Bush) Republican Line In Iraq

Pawlenty: "Saddam Hussein Himself Was A Weapon Of Mass Destruction." [Star Tribune, 2/14/04]
Pawlenty Said "It's Important That We Stay The Course." [CNN International, 2/13/04]
Pawlenty Said The Wars In Iraq And Afghanistan "Will Be Reflected Positively In History." [MSNBC, "Hardball," 7/14/04]

Eric Cantor A+ Record on Supporting Failed Bush Policies

Cantor Supports Bush An Average Of 93 Percent Per Year. Portman almost always votes with the president. On average, he supported Bush 93.4 percent of the time during a given year. [CQ Voting Studies, accessed 7/29/08]

Cantor: NAFTA Has Helped America Create "Over 25 Million Jobs." [National Review, 3/11/08]

All - some options for the SOS blank:

When the Chinese were resisting joining in the sanctions against Iran, I went to Beijing and laid it on the line with their top leadership. They joined us and the result was the most effective sanctions coalition in history, which paved the way for the current diplomacy.

When the Chinese, Indians, and Brazilians were working together to avoid responsibility for helping to fight climate change, President Obama and I crashed a meeting of their leaders and didn't leave until they agreed to share the burden.

Before the Arab Spring, when others were tiptoeing around, I went straight into the Arab capitals and told the leaders that their countries were sinking into the sand.

When Putin and his cronies interfered in the Russian elections, I stood up and called him out. He blamed me for starting the protests that rocked Moscow - I was proud to stand with everyday Russians calling for democracy.

If these don't work can try more.

Le Monde [accessed with Google Translate from French]: "Hillary Clinton: 'The Americans are open to the idea of a woman president'"

By Christophe Ayad

July 11, 2014, 11:58

What is your greatest achievement?

This is undoubtedly the work I have done to restore the image of America after eight years of the Bush administration. When we took office, President Obama and I, the country was facing a serious economic crisis, we were engaged in two wars, we lost the support of our European friends and we had ignored our allies in Asia. There was a lot of concern about the intention of the United States: we would pursue a policy unilaterally or work with others?

President appointed me Secretary of State because he wanted to stay focused on the economy. I worked hard to put out the concept of power informed [smart power] in order to finish in finish with brute force [hard power] and unilaterally that the Bush team had applied. I merged the development and diplomacy to send the message that we would work otherwise.

And if we go into detail records?

The establishment of an international coalition to enforce sanctions on Iran was hard work. There was no will the Russians, Chinese and even some Europeans were against. I spent a year and a half to build a consensus, which eventually bring the Iran to the negotiating table. I also negotiated a cease-fire in Gaza which lasted from 20 November 2012 until recent days.

I created an opening with Burma , which has led to major reforms. I deepened our relationship with China across different instances of dialogue. And I drove the "reset" with Russia , which gave very good results, including sanctions against Iran and a new disarmament treaty nuclear , as Medvedev was president.

Finally, I reformed the State Department to make more agile, more flexible, more responsive, even if it is less visible. I introduced new technologies in an administration that had remained in the telegrams of the nineteenth century. I promoted women in my department not to make pretty but because where there are women, there is more stability, more democracy and less conflict. It was a lot in four years.

What are your regrets?

The Syria of course. What is happening now is what we feared and Assad, Iran and Russia wanted to see happen . From the beginning of the Syrian uprising, Assad has not fought the terrorists, but terrorists called peaceful demonstrators calling for more freedom legitimately. And now, Assad is still in power , jihadists hold portions of territory, and the moderate opposition, it was forgotten. She did not receive the help and support she deserved.

My other regret is Benghazi, where Christopher Stevens was killed [11 September 2012]. This is a great personal loss. It was I who had sent in Benghazi during the Libyan revolution. I suggested as ambassador after the revolution. We were intensely engaged with Libyans to help to overcome forty-two years of bad governance. There was nothing left after Gaddafi. And yet, good elections were held. And then there was this huge problem posed by militias. Our ambassador, another diplomat and two other Americans were killed, alas.

After the chemical bombing on the outskirts of Damascus, August 21, 2013, President Obama has given up commit military action in Syria as Bashar Al-Assad had crossed the "red line" that he had drawn. This has he undermined the credit of America in the world?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I was no longer in office but I supported President Obama's decision to consult Congress. What was the problem? The use of chemical weapons in 2013 in violation of the rules set by the international community since the First World War.

If the president had launched a military operation, it is likely that some sites of chemical weapons have been destroyed, but not all. He would then have had to face the consequences. When the Russians have proposed a plan to dismantle the Syrian chemical arsenal, I spoke with the president and I argued. Finally, the desired result was obtained chemical weapons have been dismantled in Syria. But it is true that this sequence was not clearly enough explained, people have not always understood the reasoning.

About the Iraq , you voted for the war in 2003. In 2011, it is you who have implemented the withdrawal of U.S. troops. Did you not correct a mistake with another mistake?

I have said and written that give the green light to President Bush's war in Iraq was a mistake. I tried later to correct this error. During his campaign, President Obama made a promise: all troops should have left Iraq in late 2011, unless the Iraqi government demanded that they remain.

We worked for two years (2009-2011) to find a solution to a number of soldiers remain in Iraq. But Maliki did not want an American presence. He wanted to oppress the Sunnis and the Kurds, purge the army and deny its promises without being held accountable. The United States does not stationed military force without an agreement of the host country. This was not the case in Iraq.

What is the greatest threat to the United States? The emergence of the Islamic state, the aggressiveness of Vladimir Putin or the ambitions of China?

The most immediate threat is posed by terrorists seeking to obtain a nuclear or radioactive device. They never abandoned the desire to inflict the greatest possible losses to Westerners. At this very moment, a credible threat is the airlines operating to the United States.

Then all "rogue state" that accesses nuclear weapons, as North Korea is a threat. If Iran or any other country managed to acquire the atomic bomb, it would destabilize the world and lead to an arms race. It would be a tragic mistake. The Pakistan is a perfect example: nuclear warheads are pointed towards the India and it is at war with terrorist groups seeking to s' possession of these weapons.

Finally, there are long-term threats such as hazardous Putin's desire to go up over time, dominate its neighbors and create a sphere of influence in which it can intimidate other countries. China shows its muscles by investing heavily in its arm ed and claims sovereignty over the South and East China Sea, causing potential conflicts with Japan , the Vietnam and the Philippines . This instability can affect eventual global growth. Against Russia and China, we have put in place long-term strategies with our partners in Europe and Asia.

You doubted you that Putin was going to be as aggressive after his reelection in 2012?

Yes, I thought so. I sent two reports to President Obama about it. He had already invaded and annexed part of Georgia in 2008. It was increasingly clear that the experience of "democracy in the margins," he was allowed to develop , would not last . When tens of thousands of Russians took to the streets in late 2011 to protest against fraud in parliamentary elections, he was shocked. He could not believe that the Russians could demonstrate against him. He held me responsible, probably to forget his unpopularity.

Once elected, or rather crowned president, he asked a lot of problem. I will not say that I expected to destabilize the Ukraine and invade the Crimea. But I knew he would hate it because it could make oil stain in Russia.

Obama is often accused of being weak, indecisive, without leadership. What is your opinion?

This is not fair. The president was very clear he was elected to end the war in Iraq, and win more successful Afghanistan . The two are not of his making. In his recent speech at West Point, he made it clear he wanted other approaches to treat problems that pointing the finger tap on the table and speak harsh language. This is a thoughtful project. It may be that it takes time for it to be done, but that's not to say he is wrong. Maybe he has need to explain his method more than the rest of the world understands it better.

How to explain this paradox: you are very popular in the United States when you deal with foreign policy, but as soon as you think you are going to present to the presidential criticism rained?

American politics is like football , a sports battle. I'm not surprised: the political debate is so polarized in our country that we achieve nothing Congress. This is unfortunate because we face two crises. The first is economic: our economy is not creating enough jobs, growth is inadequate, excessive inequality.

We also have a crisis of democracy: we can not take some difficult decisions because, among Republicans, think that compromise is a dirty word. They do not want to cooperate . I am a woman who is honest, who has his opinions, which expresses. This raises comments.

The United States is prepared to have a president?

I hope, be it me or another. Now, more Americans are open to the idea of a female president. They are aware that we have not yet definitively broken the glass ceiling while 49 countries have already done.

Who inspires you in politics?

This is Nelson Mandela . I learned well know , he was a friend. I am amazed by the way, to his release from prison he was put at the service of forgiveness, reconciliation and unity. It was not easy. It is my polar star.

Politico: "Sen. Martin Heinrich backs Hillary Clinton"

By Maggie Haberman

July 11, 2014, 12:09 p.m. EDT

Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-NM) is adding his name to the roster of Senate supporters backing Hillary Clinton, serving as a draw for a New Mexico event for the super PAC "Ready for Hillary."

According to an invitation obtained by POLITICO, Heinrich and Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-NM) are headlining an event this Saturday evening Albuquerque.

Clinton has gotten a number of endorsements from her former Senate colleagues, primarily through "Ready for Hillary," a low-dollar super PAC.

FOURTH OF JULY CREEK, by Smith Henderson. (Ecco/HarperCollins, $26.99.) In Henderson's deeply impressive novel, an overburdened social worker becomes involved with a near-feral boy and his survivalist father in 1980 Montana.

HARD CHOICES, by Hillary Rodham Clinton. (Simon & Schuster, $35.) Clinton's memoir of her time as secretary of state may not be personally revealing, but it is sober and substantive.

FRIDAYS AT ENRICO'S, by Don Carpenter. Finished by Jonathan Lethem. (Counterpoint, $25.) Carpenter's eccentric posthumous novel follows four aspiring writers in the heady days of the Beats.

OUR DECLARATION: A Reading of the Declaration of Independence in Defense of Equality, by Danielle Allen. (Liveright, $27.95.) Scrutinizing our founding document, a political theorist sees it as a clarion call for equality.

UNCERTAIN JUSTICE: The Roberts Court and the Constitution, by Laurence Tribe and Joshua Matz. (Holt, $32.) A portrait of the current Supreme Court in its surprisingly messy complexity.

SCALIA: A Court of One, by Bruce Allen Murphy. (Simon & Schuster, $35.) Murphy's book is skeptical, often critical, of its subject, but it takes his ideas seriously and is free of snark.

A MOST IMPERFECT UNION: A Contrarian History of the United States, by Ilan Stavans. Illustrated by Lalo Alcaraz. (Basic Books, $26.99.) Even the ugly side is delivered with comics-style humor.

THE BOOK OF UNKNOWN AMERICANS, by Cristina Henríquez. (Knopf, $24.95.) Latino immigrant characters face the challenges of assimilation.

ELIZABETH IS MISSING, by Emma Healey. (Harper, $25.99.) A woman slipping into dementia turns detective in this spellbinding first novel.

Washington Post: "Christine Lagarde: 'Don't let the bastards get you'"

By Lillian Cunningham

July 11, 2014, 10:12 a.m. EDT

This July marks Christine Lagarde's third anniversary as head of the International Monetary Fund. When she took the post, she faced a collapsing euro zone and an institution that itself was in something of a free fall following the resignation of its previous leader, Dominique Strauss-Kahn, over allegations of a sexual assault. It was, to put it simply, an interesting time to be the first woman and the first non-economist to lead the organization.

In the three years since, Largarde has helped cool the financial flames in such countries as Greece and Ireland. She has also, though perhaps with less notice, begun to reposition the IMF's work. Climate change, income inequality and gender participation in the workforce — issues that only a decade ago would have hardly surfaced at the fund — have now become a focus of its analysis.

Yet while the organization has started to loosen its necktie in regard to its areas of research and the rigid internal hierarchy of economists, it still wrestles with a number of management challenges. Among them, Lagarde says, are difficulties in getting Congress to ratify a reform measure that would give emerging countries better representation and in getting more women — any women, in fact — onto the IMF's board.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In this interview, which has been edited lightly for length and clarity, Lagarde speaks about these management hurdles. She also reflects on the leadership lessons she's learned over a career in which she has headed international law firm Baker & McKenzie and France's Finance Ministry.

Her final words of advice: "Don't let the bastards get you."

How do you define leadership?

To me, leadership is about encouraging people. It's about stimulating them. It's about enabling them to achieve what they can achieve — and to do that with a purpose. Others would call it "a vision," but I'd rather use "purpose" because I think that everybody has a purpose in life, and that when collectively people work together, or practice sport together, they have a joint purpose.

What do you want to be your main achievement at the IMF?

I really want the institution to continue to be relevant, and to be regarded by its members — also its clients — as a place where they can receive the best possible advice, the most honest assessment of the situation, and where they can seek support and technical assistance. I sort of gather that under the word "relevance," because I think that's the most important service we can provide to the membership.

When you took over, your job was basically one of crisis management. Now perhaps there's more time to think about your vision of how to make the fund relevant into the future. How have you transitioned between managing short-term and long-term challenges? Do you think you're better at one or the other?

When I started, which was exactly three years ago, there were two crises. One was the internal situation at the IMF, because my predecessor had left under very dramatic circumstances, which had created anxiety, concern and complete lack of motivation on the part of many of the staff. The other crisis was outside, because many countries of the euro area were in great difficulties. Greece was one, but Ireland was another, Portugal was another, and soon Cyprus, and so on and so forth — and that was only in that part of the world. There were other countries elsewhere that were suffering and were seeking advice and financial support.

On both accounts, it was a question of making sure that everybody was on deck, prepared to deal with the issues, and completely motivated by the mission of the fund — which is to make sure that we put all our expertise, our money, our technical assistance and our ability to advise together, to fight the crisis and to procure some stability for the membership.

I have a theory that women are generally given space and appointed to jobs when the situation is tough. I've observed that in many instances. In times of crisis, women eventually are called upon to sort out the mess, face the difficult issues and be completely focused on restoring the situation.

Has the crisis abated, are the flames down? I wish that was the case. Obviously there is recovery in the air, but it is neither very strong nor very balanced, and there are still many countries that need support and advice. While it's not as burning and obvious as it was three years ago, we're not just doing maintenance at the moment. We are also doing some crisis management as well. It's in a way the vocation of the IMF to face crises, whether they are very high on the world agenda or rather low on the radar screen.

Have you learned anything about your own leadership skills, or weaknesses, from leading during a time of crisis?

I learned that you can constantly improve, and that you should not be shy about your views, and about the direction that you believe is right. I also learn constantly about how much people can achieve; how much they can give; how much they can go beyond themselves, step out of their comfort zone and give a lot more than they ever thought they would, or that you ever expected them to do. And it's a constant process to learn how much you should step in after having listened, and how much the team you work with can exceed your expectations.

I know your father passed away when you were young. I wonder in what ways that has shaped your character and your leadership development.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

My father passed away after three years of debilitating disease, which transformed a very strong and bright man into a real wreck. And that is hard. You have to get out of that stronger, if you can, which I was lucky to be able to. I was the eldest of the family, and I had to support my mother and help my brothers. So there was an element of empowerment that resulted from his passing away, and an element of terrible sorrow and grief, which never goes away.

Words that seem to regularly come up in describing you are "charismatic," "presence," "ability to command a room." Do you have any advice on how to cultivate those traits?

It's a question of feeling confident about yourself, being reconciled with your own identity — and your own body, actually. I remember Hillary Clinton not long ago addressing the IMF staff and saying, "Stop being obsessed about losing weight. Be okay with yourself." I thought about what she'd said, and she's right. You have to first of all be okay with yourself, accept who you are, and not fight against yourself all the time. It's hard, but I think being reconciled with your body and your identity is step one. The second step is about being honest and telling the truth, not covering up and pretending you are somebody that you are not deep down inside.

What's the one thing that you would like to see change the most about the internal culture of the IMF?

I would very much like it if there were more women on the board. At the moment I have a board where all the executive directors are male, and I think that is wrong. There's not much I can do about it other than say it loudly and clearly. Member states of the IMF designate the executive directors, and I happen to have 24 male executive directors and not a single woman.

As a second change, I would very much appreciate if the United States of America would ratify the reform that they themselves engineered about four years ago, which would give better representation to the emerging and developing countries, which are gaining ground, which are expanding and which must be given a bigger say at the international table of the IMF. Those are really two key components that would help the culture of the institution.

Other than that, I would like the culture to be as focused on quality and excellence as it is, but maybe a little less rigid in terms of attitude and willingness to let diverging views and dissenting opinions be expressed. That's something that we're working on. It's not always obvious.

Let's talk more about the quota reform. From a leadership perspective, what do you do when your biggest shareholder, the United States, is not supporting the reform you think you need?

Well, first of all, the IMF has to continue doing its job. Second, we have to acknowledge and deliver on the changes taking place in the world, by having a more diverse staff, by having a more diverse management, by welcoming representatives from China and other emerging markets, and making sure that we have more women, of course. That's what we have to continue doing no matter what.

We are making collectively all the efforts we can to convince members of Congress that it is worth it to reform the institution, as was intended in the first place by all authorities but with a strong leadership from the United States of America. It's a big letdown not to actually deliver on it, given that pretty much all members have now delivered and have ratified the reform.

The fund hasn't really grown in the past five years or so, and it's a place without high turnover. The result seems to be that a lot of good people can't move up the ladder quickly, and that you can't get women into senior positions at fast as you would like. As their leader, how are you wrestling with these personnel issues?

We have two major constraints: our demographics, which we can't deal with except by natural departure over time, and the limited territory. When you lead a corporate institution, you can expand. And whether you grow the bottom line or the top line, you have incentives at both ends and you can manage those.

At an institution like the IMF, our vocation is not to grow. Our vocation is to continue to provide the best possible services within the parameters of the mandate. So in the leadership position I'm in, I have to identify what makes people click, what motivates them. And it's not necessarily going to be promotion, as you said, so there have to be other ways to incentivize people.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I soon realized that people are motivated by the pride they take in the intellectual work they produce, and that's an important driver. A second important driver is the pride they take in serving the public good. That's another very strong engine to actually lead the institution and motivate people.

How long do you want to be there? What would you like to do after?

I know people doubt me when I say it, but I have never, never had a career plan. And maybe that was the wrong idea, but I never had a career plan. My career, which I know is successful and regarded as such, has been the result of circumstances, of meeting people, of being called, of being drafted, of taking on the job and rising to the circumstances when it was needed. So I have no idea, honestly, what I will do in two years' time, which is the end of my term. What I know is that I will do my term, because you have to finish what you started. But after that, I don't have a clue. I might be still here, I might be somewhere else. I might be doing something that I have no idea about.

What's the best piece of leadership advice anyone's given you?

Well there's one encouragement that I was given once by my American father, in the family I stayed with when I was 17. Whenever I had tough times, he would send me a little note or give me a call and he would say, "Don't let the bastards get you." And I know this is not very polite. This is not very proper language. "Don't let the bastards get you" means: "Hang on with the work that you are doing, and just don't give up. Stand up."

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Ed Klein's book is out-selling Hillary Clinton. He will not beat her with the critics or fact-checkers."

By Jaime Fuller

July 11, 2014, 11:13 a.m. EDT

News broke late Thursday that Ed Klein's book about the Obamas and the Clintons, "Blood Feud," is actually out-selling Hillary Clinton's own memoir, "Hard Choices." Given that surprising turn of events, we figured we would re-surface this post from a couple weeks ago looking at just who Klein is and what literary critics think of his work (hint: there is no love lost -- if it ever existed).

Ed Klein's new book, "Blood Feud: The Clintons v. the Obamas" is going to sell many copies. That is one fact about the book that will be hard to dispute. Klein's last book on President Obama, "The Amateur," displaced the latest volume in Robert Caro's Lyndon B. Johnson series in the number one slot on the New York Times bestseller list. His book, "The Truth about Hillary," sold about 200,000 copies.

You should probably fact-check anything else you hear about the book. The other defining characteristic of Klein's biographies, besides their popularity with people who despise the subjects unpacked within, is that the salacious details revealed often have a tenuous relationship with reality -- as commentators of all ideological stripes have pointed out time and time again.

The reviews of Klein's work, filled with contempt and adventurous adjectives, often mirror the gossipy edges of the books they describe. The reviewers may not believe all of Klein's reporting, but they are more than happy to borrow his skillful hatchet job techniques, if only to use it against him.

In anticipation of the reviews that are bound to follow the tabloid-y book excerpts featuring Michelle Obama's supposed nickname for Hillary ("Hildebeest") and new (and questionable) "revelations" about Hillary's response to the Benghazi attacks, here is a retrospective of Ed Klein book reviews. Only one features a septic tank metaphor.

“The Amateur” by Edward Klein is a book about an inept, arrogant ideologue who maintains an absurdly high opinion of his own talents even as he blatantly fails to achieve his goals. Oh, and President Obama is in this book too.

Of course Mr. Klein does not see himself as the amateur of his title. As he announces in the very first sentence, “This is a reporter’s book.” It is based on “dozens of four-inch-thick three-ring notebooks” that detail interviews with “nearly 200 people,” some of whom even allowed Mr. Klein to mention their names in print.

-- Janet Maslin, The New York Times

-- Donald Trump, The New York Post

“Ed Klein has a proven history of reckless fabrication in order to sell books. Nobody in their right mind would believe the nonsense in this one.”

-- White House spokesperson Eric Schultz

The Truth About Hillary

The book is poorly written, poorly thought, poorly sourced and full of the kind of loaded language that is appropriate to a polemic but not an investigative work.

-- Peggy Noonan, The Wall Street Journal

This is one of the most sordid volumes I’ve ever waded through. Thirty pages into it, I wanted to take a shower. Sixty pages into it, I wanted to be decontaminated. And 200 pages into it, I wanted someone to drive stakes through my eyes so I wouldn’t have to suffer through another word.

-- John Podhoretz, The New York Post

The book is so far out there with lurid allegations that I'm beginning to suspect that Mr. Klein is a double agent, pretending to be objective but in reality hoping to drum up visions of a vast right-wing conspiracy to do in poor Mrs. Clinton.

-- Alicia Colon, The New York Sun

Consider the arrival, last month, of an aggressively unflattering biography, "The Truth About Hillary: What She Knew, When She Knew It, and How Far She'll Go to Become President," by Ed Klein, which climbed the best-seller lists despite condemnatory reviews. Senator Clinton didn't read it, but Mr. Reines did.

He had to. It was up to him to provide the news media with an informed -- if uppity -- response from the Clinton camp: "This is a book full of blatant and vicious fabrications contrived by someone who writes trash for cash." Catchy. Mr. Reines now adds this: "His 15 minutes of fame are up. I'm looking forward to his biography: 'The Truth About Ed Klein: He Writes Trash for Cash.' "

-- Robin Finn, The New York Times

But Senator Clinton cannot become President of the United States. The reason, as her latest pornographer, Edward Klein, makes plain, is the lesbian situation. It is entirely possible, Klein allows, that the junior senator from New York is not herself a Sapphic practitioner. But she imbibed the “culture of lesbianism” as an undergraduate at Wellesley College in the nineteen-sixties; she has certainly known a few lesbians in her time (many names are unearthed); she definitely read a Methodist magazine called motive that published, among others, Rita Mae Brown, the author of a “lesbian novel”; and once, at a White House reunion of her Wellesley classmates, she rubbed the “butch cut” hairdo of one Nancy Wanderer, remarking, lesbianically, “Maybe I’ll get a haircut like this and really shock everyone.”

Reading “The Truth About Hillary,” one can easily envision Klein’s well-appointed desk in mid-composition, an antique lamp casting a lambent beam on his files of political smut.

-- David Remnick, The New Yorker

There are lots of reasons to distrust or even dislike Mrs Clinton. She exudes an overpowering whiff of entitlement. She seems to believe that successful career women like herself are morally superior to women who stay at home and bake cookies. She was responsible, with Hillarycare, for one of the greatest political debacles of recent years. And, most infuriating of all, she tries to play both the victim and the strong woman. But Mr. Klein has succeeded in doing the near impossible: he has written a book that will make all but fire-breathing conservatives sympathetic to her cause.

-- The Economist

Unfortunately, The Truth About Hillary fails even as pornography. It's about as arousing as footage from a hidden camera in the bathroom of a highway truck stop.

-- John F. Harris, The New York Observer

Christians should repudiate this book and determine to take no pleasure in it.

-- Albert Mohler, president of The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary

If I were a right-winger, I would be offended by both Klein and[Karl] Rove. But I am not a conservative, and so I can only wonder at their gullibility. Right-wingers are the useful idiots of our times and while they have their occasional left-wing counterparts, the lefties will not buy essentially the same book over and over again -- if only because they lack the funds. Maybe Klein has taken this as far as it will go. I hope not. My book on Hillary's romp with Paris Hilton will be out soon. It's hot.

-- Richard Cohen, The Washington Post

It's hard to believe that these voices on the right are part of a vast left-wing conspiracy to protect Hillary Clinton. Here is a far more believable explanation for the treatment of the anti-Hillary book: The networks decided -- correctly in my opinion -- that this piece of junk journalism did not deserve free publicity.

-- Paul Janensch, The Hartford Courant

He focuses overmuch on Hillary's alleged lesbianism, for instance (she didn't shave her legs and underarms at Wellesley!), and even writes that Chelsea was conceived one night when Bill raped Hillary. Only the fringiest Clinton-haters could find pleasure with that level of prurient tabloiding of a former U.S. president and a present-day U.S. senator. After a few paragraphs, you find yourself reaching for the Brillo.

-- Kathleen Parker, The Chicago Tribune

There's a danger when you throw together rumor, innuendo, mind reading, and unsubstantiated blind quotes from sources who overtly hate your subject. And it's not just the risk of looking (as Edward Klein does) like an author devoid of credibility.

-- Nina J. Easton, The Boston Globe

The latest assault is by Edward Klein, whose name commonly appears in print these days in close proximity to words like smarmy and sleazy.

-- Clyde Haberman, The New York Times

This book is the literary equivalent of a backed-up septic tank.

-- Larry Cox, The Tuscon Citizen

What I am saying is that if Klein purposely set out to write the sleaziest, most derivative, most despicable political biography ever, he has failed both himself and his readers miserably. "The Truth About Hillary" is only about the 16th sleaziest book I have ever read. Though, in fairness to the author, reading creepy, cut-and-paste books is my hobby.

-- Joe Queenan, The New York Times

Katie: The Real Story

Well, by now, you get the general flavor of Edward Klein's unauthorized biography, which seeks to portray its subject as a little bullet fired into the heart of the fourth estate. You may wonder why making that point was worth a book. You may also wonder if the same book would have been written about a male broadcaster. Finally, you may wonder why you should expect anything very serious from the author of "The Kennedy Curse," which describes the late Carolyn Bessette Kennedy as "sprawled on the floor in front of a sofa, disheveled and hollow-eyed, snorting cocaine with a gaggle of gay fashionistas."

It takes a tough man to write a phrase like "gaggle of gay fashionistas," and, in fact, Klein has made a second career of leaving knuckle prints on famous women.

-- Louis Bayard, The Washington Post

All Too Human: The Love Story of Jack and Jackie Kennedy

Ed Klein as every legal right to author a book like this one. St. Martin's Press has every right to publish it.

But neither one of them should feel especially proud today.

Wall Street Journal: "For the Wealthy, Silence May Be Golden"

By Daisy Maxey

July 11, 2014, 12:58 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Those who've risen from humble beginnings may not see themselves as wealthy

Those who coach the rich on what to say--and leave unsaid--about their money see Hillary Clinton's controversial "dead broke" comment as a big mistake. And a common one.

"She doesn't feel she's defined by her financial wealth," notes Katherine Lintz, founder of Matter Family Office.

Her firm, with offices in Clayton, Mo., and in Denver, handles about 150 families with fortunes that range from $3 million to $1 billion. Many built their own businesses and came from humble beginnings, and they "don't think of themselves as one of the 1%," she says.

"They're head-down, working," she says. "Their vision of themselves is no different than it was when they were 25 years old hiring their first employee."

Nonetheless, Mrs. Clinton's much-criticized reference to her and her husband's indebtedness in 2001, which she made in an ABC interview in June, broke a cardinal rule that Ms. Lintz and other advisers to the wealthy often stress: Be circumspect.

"The smartest thing for the wealthy person to do is not to say anything about their wealth," says Robert Dilenschneider, who leads Dilenschneider Group Inc., a New York public-relations firm that does coaching work for some family offices and also works directly with many executives.

Comments about financial status that are incorrect, misunderstood or too revealing can prove troublesome for anyone. But for the very wealthy, these can harm their public image or career, attract Internal Revenue Service scrutiny or--in a worst-case scenario--put them in danger.

Of course, politicians with lots of money can't avoid discussing their finances, which are often a matter of record. Athletes and celebrities, whose big-money contracts also often become public knowledge, face the issue, too, as do a lot of moneyed individuals who go through headline-making divorces, Mr. Dilenschneider notes.

At that point, "it stretches credibility" to play down one's financial status too much, he says. And "to say, 'I'm poor' is a big mistake. It offends poor people." Mrs. Clinton herself, in retrospect, called her word choice "inartful."

Like Ms. Lintz, Mr. Dilenschneider deals with some clients who are very rich but don't feel it. He recalls one who was worth $13 billion--and complained about the cost of an English muffin at a Times Square breakfast spot.

On the other hand, some wealthy people make a very different kind of mistake when discussing their money: They brag about it.

Ms. Lintz has counseled some clients who, after making a big charitable donation, "may have boasted too much about it." Even if their philanthropic urge was genuine, this can set them up for criticism--and also make them a target for con-men or other criminals.

She asks clients to ponder this question: "Who's going to pick up the paper today that you really want to know your financial business, and then act on it?" She adds, "I don't know really what the upside is of that."

She encourages her clients, when speaking publicly, to focus on their experiences--the mistakes they've made in life, the lessons they've learned--rather than their finances.

"All communication in the public eye just needs to be real and honest," Ms. Lintz says. Being too boastful or overly humble "is just not attractive."

Nonprofit Quarterly: "The Philanthropic Problem with Hillary Clinton's Huge Speaking Fees"

By Rick Cohen

July 11, 2014, 14:16

If you have spent any time with Bill or Hillary Clinton in person, as this writer has, you'll get this point: Whether you like or hate their politics, you cannot deny their brilliance. The former president is a phenomenal, freewheeling thinker, able to integrate knowledge from multiple sources with insight that puts him a level above the crowd. His spouse, the former senator and Secretary of State and probable presidential candidate, possesses a steely, directed brilliance that is in sharp contrast with her more extemporaneous husband. Even on their individual merits, were they not the most powerful political couple in the United States, you would want to hear them talk—and maybe even pay them to do so.

But speaking fees for Bill and Hillary Clinton—and now their daughter Chelsea as well—are a cause for nonprofit and philanthropic concern, particularly with nonprofit entities that pay huge sums, six- and seven-figure fees to bring the Clintons to the dais. The news reports about the speaking fees and related political blowback regarding the Clintons have been increasing geometrically:

Between January 2001, when he left office, and January 2013, when Hillary Clinton left her position as Secretary of State, the former president has received $104.9 million in fees for delivering 542 speeches. The largest source of his speaking gigs? Wall Street banks and other financial services firms, which recruited the former president for 102 speeches and paid him $19.6 million.

In some cases, the former president's speaking fees have been astronomical. Last year, the Jewish National Fund, the Israeli organization that owns or controls a significant part of that nation's actual real estate, offered to pay President Clinton $500,000 in return for the president's speaking at Israeli President Shimon Peres's 90th birthday celebration. After an outcry in Israel and in the U.S., the JNF withdrew its half-million-dollar offer. That sum, though, is a quarter-million lower than the highest fee reportedly paid to President Clinton: $750,000 for an address to the telecom company Ericsson in Hong Kong.

The Washington Post's Philip Rucker reports that Hillary Clinton's average speaking fee tops $200,000, with the former Secretary of State accepting lower fees or waiving them on occasion for black-tie society gigs.

For a speech earlier this year to students and faculty at the University of California at Los Angeles, Hillary Clinton was paid $300,000, the money coming from a private trust established by Scope Industries CEO Meyer Luskin to fund a lecture series at the school. Two years ago, the UCLA paid Bill Clinton $250,000 for a speech.

The Post further reported that Hillary Clinton has scored at least $1 million this year in speaking fees for speeches at the University at Buffalo, Colgate University, and Hamilton College in New York, as well as Simmons College in Boston and the University of Miami in Florida—each declining to reveal how much they paid the former Secretary of State-- plus $251,250 from a donor fund for a speech the University of Connecticut and the $300,000 for the UCLA gig.

At the University of Nevada, Las Vegas, the UNLV is paying Hillary Clinton $225,000 for speaking at its annual fundraising dinner, scheduled for October 13th. The foundation is charging people to hear the former Secretary of State as much as $20,000 for some tables ($18,000 of that cost tax deductible) and has sold $353,000 in "high dollar seats." This would give UNLV a profit from Clinton's speech notwithstanding the high fee, though lower than the $250,000 it paid the former President in 2012 to speak to 992 guests. UNLV student government leaders have split on this issue, with some calling for Hillary Clinton to donate her fee to the university as a charitable gesture.

In the wake of questions regarding Hillary Clinton's self-acknowledged less than artful contention that she and Bill left the White House "dead broke," family spokespersons revealed that daughter Chelsea Clinton, in addition to earning $600,000 a year as a special correspondent for NBC News, where she is rarely ever seen on camera, takes in as much as $75,000 for her speeches.

The Clintons are able to command speaking fees that are close to unparalleled among politicians and celebrities. After leaving office, former Vice President Al Gore got $156,000 for a half-hour lecture in London. Former President George W. Bush's typical speaking fee is apparently $110,000. Dick Cheney's fee per address is about $75,000 and his daughter Liz's around $20,000. Former presidential candidate Mitt Romney makes between $40,000 and $60,000 for his appearances. In general, the Clinton fees on the political celebrity speaking circuit are like "max contracts" for players in the NBA; everyone else can only hope someday to see those numbers.

The criticism of the Clinton speeches, particularly Hillary Clinton's, is that she is taking in huge sums as she marches toward her all but inevitable presidential campaign, and that many of these huge fees are coming from colleges and universities which generate their income through charitable donations and tax revenues. Because Clinton is not yet an official candidate, her income from these speeches and her use of the fees does not have to be declared in the financial disclosure reports that are required of candidates.

Hillary Clinton defended her fees in an interview with ABC's Ann Compton. All of her speaking fees (and apparently Chelsea's as well) are turned over to the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation, the public charity that the family controls and operates. The high-profile foundation has a laudable mission: "to improve global health, strengthen economies, promote health and wellness, and protect the environment by fostering partnerships among governments, businesses, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and private citizens to turn good intentions into measurable results." Among its programs are the Clinton Global Initiative; the Clinton Guistra Enterprise Partnership, geared to creating, scaling, and replicating social enterprises in the developing world—a special interest of Canadian financier Frank Giustra, who very controversially used his connection to President Clinton (helped by a $100 million donation to the CGI) to land face time with Kazakhstan's brutal dictator, Nursultan Nazarbayev, to negotiate a lucrative uranium mining deal; the Clinton Foundation in Haiti; many international health initiatives; the Clinton Climate Initiative "to create and advance solutions to root causes of climate change"; and the Clinton Presidential Center.

ABC reports, however, that it has been unable to get Hillary Clinton to provide documentation attesting to the donation of her speaking fees to the foundation. A review of the Clinton Foundation's Form 990s for several of the past years reveals no disclosure of the names of major donors and therefore no information as to whether Hillary Clinton (or Bill Clinton, for that matter) has been donating speaking fees to their philanthropy. However, Hillary Clinton's commitment to donate the speaking fees may be a decision of somewhat recent vintage, to be revealed in future 990s. (The most recent Clinton Foundation 990 available to the public on GuideStar or the Foundation Center's online directory is from tax year 2012.)

Because the foundation is a 501(c)(3) public charity, however, it is not required to reveal the names of its donors and the amount they are giving the Clinton Foundation. For Hillary Clinton to fulfill her pledge of transparency, the foundation would have to take a step that it is typically not required to do. In light of the political backdrop of the Clinton Foundation, this additional voluntary transparency is very important. Disclosure of donations to charities and foundations controlled by powerful political figures should be done as a matter of course, whether they are the Clintons' speaking fees or the six- and seven-figure contributions of corporate and other donors who might have expectations of something in the future.

One issue may be the ultimate sources of the payments for the Clinton speaking fees, who might be anticipating a good word, a positive reaction, or a business-world endorsement from the most powerful political couple in the nation. But there is another issue: These donations to Hillary Clinton's income that are then transferred to her family foundation are not simply private contributions. In many cases, and particularly the most recent, these mammoth speaking fees are not from individual (or corporate) charitable donors, but from universities. Hillary Clinton defended the dynamic:

"I have been very excited to speak to many universities during the last year and a half, and all of the fees have been donated to the Clinton Foundation for it to continue its life-changing and lifesaving work," Clinton told ABC. "So it goes from a Foundation at a university to another foundation."

In other words, through her speeches, Hillary Clinton is in a way "repurposing" the donations others are making—or taxpayers are making—to these colleges and universities. The universities, like UNLV, take pains to suggest that, according to Michael Wixom, a member of the Nevada Board of Regents, "no student funds, no tuition funds, no state dollars are being used in any way to pay her fee," but that only works in cases like UNLV's where the venue is a fundraiser at which moneyed interests pay big sums, partially tax-deductible, for the honor of hearing Clinton's speech. In other instances, the universities point to privately funded endowments or trusts that pay for Clinton and perhaps other speakers as well—or in many cases, they don't even reveal how much they are paying or where the money for the speaking fees comes from.

Nonetheless, the optics aren't good. Money is largely fungible. Students and their parents are hard-pressed by tuition increases—a four-year increase of 17 percent in the Nevada higher education system, a 6.5 percent increase announced this year for the University of Connecticut, the imposition of "student success fees" at many University of California system campuses as substitutes for formal tuition increases—making the Clintons' speaking fees look problematic. Universities have squirmed under Congressional scrutiny but largely left unchanged such policies as amazingly high salaries for university presidents (41 of whom had compensation packages of more than $1 million as of 2011) and very low spending rates despite huge growth in their endowments in many cases, an issue constantly raised by Senator Charles Grassley of Iowa, pressing universities, much like foundations, to spend more from their endowments.

The Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation may be doing extraordinarily wonderful things for communities around the world, but additional transparency is needed, especially now that Hillary Clinton is just about guaranteed the Democratic nod for the presidency; her speaking fees from nonprofit and public universities raise questions about what the universities (or some of their well-healed donors) might want from the Clintons.

In the case of Bill and Hillary Clinton, their intersection with nonprofits and foundations is hardly superficial. In her pre-candidacy days, Hillary Clinton co-founded the Arkansas Advocates for Children and Families. She was the first woman chairperson of the board of the national Legal Services Corporation and also chaired the Children's Defense Fund, founded and run by civil rights activist Marion Wright Edelman. In philanthropy, she was a board member and one-time chair of the New World Foundation, a prominent funder of politically progressive of left-wing causes, and served on the board of the Wal-Mart corporation, whose corporate practices and philanthropic giving, generally the largest year upon year among all corporations, have been subjected to sometimes sharp criticism from political liberals.

In 1999, as First Lady, Hillary Clinton co-hosted the first-ever White House conference on philanthropy, with an accompanying report that called on foundations to do more for poor people and on wealthy people to give more, particularly in comparison to the charitable generosity of American's poor and working classes. It was notable—and not just a bit humorous—when President Clinton called for the wealthy classes, as a result of a huge run-up in the stock market, to increase their charitable giving by at least one percent of their income:

"As we've had this phenomenal increase in wealth in our country, I would feel even better if the percentage of our national income devoted to charitable giving had gone up just a little bit. You heard Hillary say what we could do if we could just increase it by 1 percent," the President said at the program. "But going from 2 to 3 percent is a huge increase. We've been sort of stuck at 2 percent. Now, when the stock market triples, 2 percent is a lot more than it used to be. That's not real pocket change; it's real money."

We doubt that the irony of the president calling for a one-percent increase in charitable giving with the backdrop of progressive foundations—like New World—campaigning in conjunction with the National Network of Grantmakers was due to a simple slip of the tongue on his part. He might have seemed to be simply riffing, but having watched him before and after, we would suggest that he knew exactly what he was doing. Ten years later, when Clinton spoke at a Council of Foundations-sponsored program on rural philanthropy and called out "foundation activity in rural America has been woefully inadequate," he knew exactly what he was saying then as well. In both instances, the uncomfortable reactions of foundation CEOs in the room were fun to watch, even if private foundations haven't budged on their defense of a five percent foundation payout (including related administrative expenses) or appreciably increased their grantmaking to rural America.

Now in charge of a very large foundation that is able to convene rich people from around the world and tally up their commitments to Clinton Foundation initiatives, both for international aid and for their domestic and presidential library program priorities, Bill and Hillary Clinton know their way around nonprofits and foundations to a degree probably unlike any other White House occupants. Probably only the Obamas, given President Obama's past service on the board of the Woods Fund of Chicago and First Lady Michelle Obama's numerous nonprofit connections, from the Chicago office of Public Allies to her work as a vice president for the University of Chicago hospital, compare in their personal nonprofit and philanthropic engagements prior to Barack Obama's election as president.

Bill and Hillary Clinton know nonprofits and foundations better than almost any politician you will encounter. Their political advisors are dealing with the controversial political optics of the massive speaking fees by emphasizing the deposit of the fees to the Clinton's family foundation as opposed to the Clintons' own pockets. But the concern about the Clintons' speaking fees isn't one of political image. It is more than, as some in the press have intimated, a concern that the Clintons have become well ensconced in the top one percent of the nation's socio-economic elite, aided and abetted by income from speaking fees.

The issue is that the philanthropic beneficiary of the speeches is a foundation, structured as a public foundation but clearly synonymous with and controlled by the Clinton family. Bill Clinton is arguably the most powerful and influential political figure in the nation, in or out of office. Unless her campaign tanks as it did in 2008, Hillary Clinton has an awfully good shot of becoming President of the United States. Donors and institutions that are paying them and their daughter huge sums for their speeches may very well be buying recognition and face time with powerful political leaders who they hope will be able to deliver political favors in the future.

It is troubling when corporate donors give to political charities with a more or less obvious expectation that softer and gentler treatment will ensue in the future. It is also troubling when some of the payers are public or nonprofit entities themselves such as colleges and universities, converting taxpayer funds and tax-exempt donations into signals that could end up in positive treatment when these institutions are themselves seeking access and favors, even if it is only a good word put in by one of the Clintons to a federal agency providing funding or to a regulator who might be taking a critical look at university tuitions and endowment payouts. It would be terribly disappointing to imagine that the colleges and universities paying the Clintons these sums might be fronting, hopefully unknowingly, for individual donors supporting these colleges' lecture series, but individually have personal or political agendas that would benefit from being associated with an institution of higher education that pays Bill or Hillary Clinton a couple of hundred thousand for a speech—even if the money ends up in the Clintons' family foundation.

In her 2008 Democratic primary campaign against Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton was resistant to calls to release the names of donors to the Clinton Foundation. Obama got a leg up against her as the "transparency candidate," even go so far as to reveal, unlike Clinton, his senatorial earmarks, including two that went to Public Allies and one that was a request for $1 million for the University of Chicago hospital. In the presidential arena, transparency and disclosure always helps. In 2014—and as the presidential campaign for 2016 looms—Hillary Clinton should be doing the same and, given some of the legitimate criticisms, thinking seriously about the practice of taking large speaking fees from colleges and universities and repurposing them for her family foundation.

Subject: Ukraine oped by Madeleine Albright and Jim O'Brien

Madeleine Albright: A strategic vision for Ukraine
Madeleine Albright, Jim O'Brien
Madeleine Albright was secretary of state from 1997 to 2001. Jim O'Brien was presidential envoy for the Balkans in the Clinton administration. She is chairman and he is vice chairman of the Albright Stonebridge Group.

When President Obama and European allies meet next week , they can begin forming a meaningful response to Vladimir Putin's adventurism. This new strategy should note that Putin's view of the world is rooted in dangerous fictions.

Churchill said Russia was a riddle wrapped in a mystery inside an enigma. Under Putin, Russia's rhetoric can be described as a fantasy inside a delusion wrapped in a tissue of lies. He may believe that Ukrainians are fascists intending to attack Russians, but it is not true. Ukraine's interim government is widely representative, and no outside observer has found evidence of a campaign of violence against Russians.

The greatest disaster of the 20th century was not, as Putin has said, the dissolution of the Soviet Union. The greatest disasters of that century were one world war that came about as a result of uncertain leadership and unclear priorities; another world war that began when ethnic jealousies were used as a pretext for domination; and a half a century during which a totalitarian power oppressed its own people and its neighbors. The first was a result of misunderstandings, the second a result of outright lies and the third a result of brute force.

After the Soviet empire collapsed, the hope was to have a Europe whole and free and for Russia to be a part of it. But to Putin, the ultimate revisionist, Russia has spent more than 20 years being insulted, unable to project its power, to persuade others or to stop others from projecting their power. He tells Russians not of their potential to join the world but that they are victims and have enemies. In reality, Russia is more prosperous today than during the Soviet era, and its citizens benefit more from international involvement.

Given that Putin's aggression has broken international law, it is interesting that he is trying to justify his actions with precedents — which also are not based on facts. Putin says that he is doing what other states did in Kosovo , but that is simply not true. In the 1990s, international interventions in the Balkans were approved, contributed to and governed by large numbers of states in many institutions and informal arrangements, including the U.N. Security Council. Steps were taken over many years, with force used only after diplomacy was exhausted.

Drawing on this package of fictions, Putin has resorted to military power and propaganda — his available tools — and has acted in a place where a majority of the population is Russian and where he thinks manipulating ethnic tensions might work. His lies cannot be allowed to stand. If his doctrine of "helping" minorities that are not in danger were endorsed, the world would become much more dangerous. Only a firm response has a chance of preventing this scenario from being repeated. Putin's Russia may not listen, but states around the world are looking to see how the United States and its allies answer.

To that end, we have made a good beginning. The European Union has signed an association agreement with Ukraine . The United States and others have supported international observers, reinforced our allies in Central and Eastern Europe, and pledged financial and security support for the interim Ukrainian government. Sanctions are in place against those who have violated international law, and more are coming.

But these steps, and those that follow, must be in service of a wider strategic vision. The best principles to draw from are those that have guided the West since World War II: that each country may decide its own relationships, and that Europe should be democratic, free and undivided.

The strategy should have three parts.

First, the status of the territories Putin claims should remain disputed. No aid should flow to Crimea, and its officials should not have international standing. Europeans, Americans and the International Monetary Fund must help Ukraine with funds, a plan and advisers.

Second, the president and U.S. allies should let Russia's leaders and its people know that Russia would be welcome if it chooses to be a responsible member of the international order. We welcome those who would measure their country's greatness by its wealth, engagement with the world and stability of relationships with neighbors, and not only by military power on its borders.

It is not for us to say who governs Russia. But Putin's authority lies in his role as arbiter among 400 so-called men of power who benefit from state-controlled banks and companies. They and he should be made to feel the price of his actions. Their assets should be subject to scrutiny and interdiction when they cross international boundaries.

Third, and most important, President Obama's trip to Europe for the Group of Seven and the U.S.-E.U. Summit should produce a strategy for the states bordering Russia. The crux of any strategy must be to create durable economic and social ties for Ukraine and the West.

Here we can draw a lesson from the Balkans. As the Kosovo War ended in 1999, President Bill Clinton concluded that the weak states of the region, torn by ethnic divisions, could not thrive. He immediately pledged at a summit in Sarajevo to bring those states into a Europe whole, democratic and free.

Obama and our allies can make a similar pledge next week and immediately take steps to support the macroeconomic stability of Ukraine and key countries, to integrate their companies into trading relationships and to allow the people of the region opportunities to pursue education and employment, in a manageable fashion. A stronger transatlantic community embodied in the proposed transatlantic trade agreement would provide a magnet for countries looking to reject the Eurasian Union.

We must recognize, however, that Ukrainians have to be able to defend themselves. While we are beginning to provide some non-lethal assistance, the president needs to reverse a previous proposal to cut funding for a program to modernize the Ukrainian military. The Ukrainian government also needs help defending against cyberattacks and help with policing, especially riot control.

As Ukrainians prepare for presidential elections in May, they will be seeking leaders who can deliver and help them live as they want. Since the Orange Revolution, the Ukrainian people have made clear that they want to participate in Europe. Then, they were failed by their leaders but also by the international community, which did not pay enough attention.

It does not happen often that a country is given a second chance. Ukrainians have one, and so do international leaders. World War I was followed by World War II and the Cold War. History will not forgive those responsible if another Cold War occurs.

Experts React, Fact-Check McCain Speech on Nuclear Proliferation

~ All agree that his unrealistic rhetoric and confrontational stances are unproductive to keeping America and the world safe and secure ~

Washington, D.C. - In reaction to John McCain's speech this morning on his views on nuclear proliferation and greater strategy for Asia, National Security Network compiled the following reactions from experts who agree that the speech and his overall outlook are misguided and return to the failed policies of the past:

> "John McCain says we should not undermine our allies by talking to North Korea, but in fact our allies in East Asia want us to talk to and engage North Korea. We lost their confidence under the Bush administration by holding to ideological positions that did not work instead of listening to our friends and working the problem to a realistic solution. Returning to the isolationist days of the first Bush term will only weaken our alliance and give North Korea a justification to resume their nuclear efforts."
> -Jon Wolfsthal, Fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies

> "Senator McCain's speech conveniently glosses over the largest factor undermining American ability to stem the flow of nuclear weapons in Asia and around the world: our strategic preoccupation in Iraq. For a Senator campaigning on reasserting America's diplomatic leverage to decrease the proliferation of these deadly weapons, his "100 year" Iraq plan further hinders our power to do just that."
> -Price Floyd, Director of External Relations, Center for a New American Security

> "John McCain has made a major effort to reach for the votes of the of the arms control community with a broad speech on non-proliferation. Unfortunately, cooperation with Russia, the basic premise of the speech, is undermined by his earlier promise to throw Russia out of the G-8 and his continued support for ballistic missile defense in eastern Europe. An odd slip-up for a purported national security expert."
> -Rand Beers, President of the National Security Network

Also, John Wolfsthal wrote the following longer reaction piece to McCain's speech:

> McCain's Nonproliferation Policy-It's a Wolf in Sheep's Clothing
> John McCain's speech on nuclear weapons seems to adopt the narrowest of lenses in dealing with nuclear weapons. Moreover, his proposals - many of which might sound good - don't match up with other things he has said on nuclear weapons, on Russia, on Iran and suggests he doesn't really get the complexity of these issues. Lastly, the tone may be better, but many of the proposals-not to mention his language choices-are right out of George W. Bush's play book. This may be a wolf in sheep's clothing, but it is still a wolf.

1) He wants to work with Russia on arms control and tactical nuclear weapons, but he also wants to kick Russia out of the G-8. Not sure how you get them to play nice on nukes after you kick them in the teeth. Also, Bush adopted a loose standard on counting nuclear weapons and verification. Will McCain (who is now working with John Bolton - father of Bush arms control dogma) be any better?

2) I applaud his desire to get tactical nuclear weapons out of Europe, but if we pull nuclear weapons out of Turkey as Iran advances its nuclear program, they are not going to have increased confidence in NATO and the US. This speech, and the references to it, will send shock waves through Europe and and a McCain Administration would start in a hole.

3) He does not walk away from the new "reliable replacement warhead" being pitched by the Bush administration. Lots of wiggle room for him, left there on purpose, I would guess.

4) Why is only the Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) going to review nuclear policy? Where are the experts on nonproliferation, diplomacy, history, etc? This is the same line the Bush administration gave. In May of 2000, standing in front of Secretary Kissinger and other republican heavy-weights, then-candidate Bush said he would reduce nuclear weapons to the lowest number consistent with U.S. security. Sound familiar? McCain's statement is almost an exact quote. The JCS has set the current floor on reductions. The President sets the war guidance for the level of nuclear weapons, and leaving it to the JCS is a recipe for the status quo.

5) Did anyone else notice that McCain did not repudiate the policy of regime change? I know why Iran and North Korea want nuclear weapons. Reducing ours will not get them to change their course. Of course, singing "bomb bomb Iran" to the tune of "Barbara Ann" won't do it either. Is McCain really suggesting cutting our nukes will lead others to reduce theirs? It's the broader policy that needs changing, not just the number of nukes.

6) Coming out of left field (or from pander-ville) is the remark about international nuclear storage. It is possible that Russia might build a storage facility for countries in East Asia, but McCain seems to be suggesting some other country is going to accept our huge (the world's largest) stock of spent fuel and that this might be a way to avoid opening the spent fuel repository in Yucca Mountain, Nevada. Talk about pandering. Who does he think is going to take our nuclear waste? Even if someone would take it off our hands, the stuff contains about 100,000 weapons worth of plutonium that must be dealt with. Does McCain really want to export that to a country poor enough to want into the nuclear waste storage business?

7) Either you are for the ban on nuclear testing or you are not. The Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty is the most studied arms control agreement in history. It has been verifiable since the 1960s. McCain voted against it. To play the "let's study it again" dance is too cute by half. If the President does not support it, it is not going to happen. Also, McCain seems to be suggesting we should re-open the agreement for new modifications. That is the fastest way to kill it. He also talks about limiting testing. We want to ban testing. We have more nuclear expertise than anyone - why we would want to make the world safe for others to test nuclear weapons is unclear. Obama and Clinton have said they are for the CTBT and plan to fight for its ratification. McCain has not. The rest of the world - including the states we need on our side to deal with Iran and North Korea - are embarrassed that we have not ratified it.

McCain's speech is a feeble attempt to try to tie all Republicans and Democrats into the failures of the Bush administration nuclear policies. Before 2000, the US was on the right track. The regime needed work, but was sound - more states had given up nuclear weapons and weapon programs in the 1980s and 90s than had begun them. Now that track record lies in ashes - because of the Bush Administration approach, backed by a Republican Congress that killed the CTBT and sought to restrict funding for nuclear security efforts during 2000-2004. McCain is promising more of the same.

NSN's policy team produced the following posts below on DemocracyArsenal further scrutinizing the speech and McCain's Wall Street Journal Op-Ed :

McCain's Disjointed Russia Policy
Posted by Ilan Goldenberg

OK, so John McCain is back to wishful thinking today laying out his bold new plan for stemming proliferation. Obviously, reducing the stockpiles of nuclear weapons is critical to American and world security. But his plan misses one slightly important detail. The critical players in this field are obviously Russia and the United States - by far the two largest nuclear powers in the world. McCain proposes a close working relationship with the Russians on these issues, and yet just two months ago in Los Angeles when he laid out his view of the world, he suggested tossing Russia out of the G8 - a needlessly provocative act that would essentially mark the start of a new Cold War in Europe. On top of that he continues to support a regional missile defense system for Europe, which a crucial nuclear security concern for the Russians. Does he really think that he can alienate the Russians and at the same time get their cooperation on critical nuclear issues? Is he that divorced from reality? Or is he just ignoring what he said two months ago? Either way, it doesn't make much sense.

Here is what he said at the Los Angeles Council on World Affairs:

> We should start by ensuring that the G-8, the group of eight highly industrialized states, becomes again a club of leading market democracies: it should include Brazil and India but exclude Russia. Rather than tolerate Russia's nuclear blackmail or cyber attacks, Western nations should make clear that the solidarity of NATO, from the Baltic to the Black Sea, is indivisible and that the organization's doors remain open to all democracies committed to the defense of freedom.

And here is what he is saying today:

> As our two countries possess the overwhelming majority of the world's nuclear weapons, we have a special responsibility to reduce their number. I believe we should reduce our nuclear forces to the lowest level we judge necessary, and we should be prepared to enter into a new arms control agreement with Russia reflecting the nuclear reductions I will seek. Further, we should be able to agree with Russia on binding verification measures based on those currently in effect under the START Agreement, to enhance confidence and transparency.

McCain's basic plan is to slap the Russians smack across the face and then ask them for a favor. Somehow I don't think that will work.

McCain apparently does not understand US policy toward Iran
Posted by Max Bergmann

In John McCain's speech today he says something very very puzzling:

> Many believe all we need to do to end the nuclear programs of hostile governments is have our president talk with leaders in Pyongyang and Tehran, as if we haven't tried talking to these governments repeatedly over the past two decades.

So McCain thinks that the President of the United States has been negotiating with the Iranians for the past two decades? Huh? Does McCain not understand that the stated policy of the U.S. government since April 7, 1980 has been to NOT TALK TO THE IRANIANS. And that we have not negotiated with Iran over their nuclear weapons program.

McCain More Extreme Than Bush on North Korea
Posted by Ilan Goldenberg

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So on top of North Korea McCain decides that on North Korea it's actually better to be more extreme than George Bush. From 2000-2006 the Administration pursued a failed policy that got us no closer to eliminating the nuclear threat and actually ended with the detonation of a North Korean nuclear bomb. Now McCain says he wants to return to that policy:

> American leadership is also needed on North Korea. We must use the leverage available from the U.N. Security Council resolution passed after Pyongyang's 2006 nuclear test to ensure the full and complete declaration, disablement and irreversible dismantlement of its nuclear facilities, in a verifiable manner, which we agreed to with the other members of the six-party talks.

Seems innocent enough, except it didn't work for six years and has now been dismissed by all but the hardest line Bush Administration officials. Glen Kessler has more .

What is John McCain talking about?
Posted by Max Bergmann
I mean really - what is he talking about?

In the Wall Street Journal today, McCain and Lieberman write?

> Top leaders in Asia have warned that a precipitous American retreat from Iraq would empower al Qaeda in its global terror campaign and badly undermine America's position in Asia. We should listen to them.

Which top leaders? Who are they talking about? Do McCain and Lieberman realize that John Howard is no longer Prime Minister of Australia?

About VoteVets.org

Dear John,

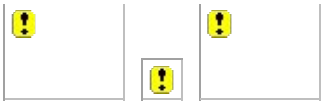
What a way to kick off 2013! Today, after over 13,000 of you (including over 8000 Veterans and Military Families) signed a petition in support of Chuck Hagel, President Obama will announce him as the nominee to be Secretary of Defense.

Be sure to tune into the announcement at 1pm EST today.

This is a huge victory for us – but the fight is not over yet. Neocons will be doing their absolute worst to try to derail the nomination. The reason is simple – they're wrong on defense, and Chuck Hagel is not only right, but is willing to call them out.

Here's why Chuck Hagel will make a tremendous Secretary of Defense.

- First, and foremost, as an enlisted soldier, who fought in Vietnam and was awarded the Purple Heart twice, Chuck Hagel's heart is still with the fighting men and women in uniform. When it comes to military action, Chuck Hagel will ask two questions: Is this good for American security, and is this good for our troops? That is something that is desperately needed.
- Second, when it comes to American security, Chuck Hagel bravely broke with his party and his party's President, to stand up against the war in Iraq, which will go down in history as one of our most misguided military ventures. Chuck Hagel has no fear when it comes to standing up to neoconservatives, and their preemptive war, nation building dreams.
- Third, and equally as important, Chuck Hagel is a vociferous advocate for cutting Pentagon waste - from outdated weapons to our over-bloated nuclear arsenal, both of which eat up billions and billions of dollars. In these tough economic times, Chuck Hagel will have no problem identifying waste at the Department of Defense, and cutting it.



So, this is a great moment for you, for the nation, and for VoteVets.org. If you have a moment, take to Twitter, and voice your support for Chuck Hagel! Thanks for your support!

Sincerely,
Jon Soltz

Thank you. I am delighted to be here. You are part of a great story - the revival of a city that means so much to all Americans. In these past few years, when confronted with grave challenges, you have seized the opportunity to reform the city you love.

And you have begun to repair the damage done by decades of mismanagement and empty promises.

I want to congratulate Governor Rick Snyder for his leadership. I want to acknowledge Secretary of State Ruth Johnson, and Attorney General Bill Schuette. And Mayor Mike Duggan for his determination to serve the city of his birth.

I want to recognize as well the hard work of Kevyn Orr, who I am proud to say is a son of Florida.

And finally, I want to recognize all those who were involved in making difficult and often painful decisions. Your work is not complete. But your efforts have captured the attention of our nation. Because across the U.S., we are asking ourselves the same questions:

How do we recapture the prosperity and opportunity that once defined cities like Detroit?

How do we restore America's faith in the moral promise of our great nation that any child born today can reach further than their parents?

This is an urgent issue: Far too many Americans live on the edge of economic ruin.And many more feel like they're struck in place, working longer and harder, even as they're losing ground.

Tens of millions of Americans no longer see a clear path to rise above their challenges. Something is holding them back. Not a lack of ambition. Not a lack of hope. Not because they are lazy or see themselves as victims.

Something else. Something is an artificial weight on their shoulders.

Today and in the coming weeks, I will address this critical issue.

And I will offer a new vision. A plan of action that is different than what we have been hearing in

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington D.C. It is a vision rooted in conservative principles and tethered to our shared belief in opportunity and the unknown possibilities of a nation given the freedom to act, to create, to dream and to rise.

We see that belief every day in action.

In oil and gas fields once given up for dry we are now assuring America's energy security. In hospitals, we are extending life and beating back once untreatable diseases. In charter schools, we are connecting students to their potential. In labs and hacker spaces, invention comes from every corner of society and the world still comes to America to learn how to create and innovate.

People know this country can be more than it is today. And that each one of us can, and must, be a part of it.

But they know this as well: We have a lot of work to do.

Today, Americans across the country are frustrated. They see only a small portion of the population riding the economy's up escalator... It's true enough that we've seen some recent and welcome good news on the economy.

But it's very little, and it's come very late.

Six years after the recession ended, median incomes are down, households are, on average, poorer ... and millions of people have given up looking for a job altogether. Roughly two out of three American households live paycheck to paycheck. Any unexpected expense can push them into financial ruin. We have a record number of Americans on food stamps and living in poverty.

The recovery has been everywhere but in the family paychecks. The American Dream has become a mirage for far too many. So the central question we face here in Detroit and across America is this: Can we restore that dream -- that moral promise -- that each generation can do better?

If we can't answer that question, no tax, no new welfare program, will save our system or our way of life. Because America's moral promise isn't broken when someone is wealthy. It's broken when achieving success is far beyond our imagination.

America is a place where, as Lincoln dreamed, any person may look forward and hope to be a hired laborer this year...and the next, work for himself... and finally, to hire men to work for him!

America, though discouraged, has not given up on the dream of Lincoln.

The dream of Lincoln is alive at 5 a.m. at a bus depot in a distant suburb or in an inner city as workers get to jobs in hotels and restaurants and hospitals. The dream is alive in the breath of a construction worker running cable under a city street in the bitter night air.

The dream is alive in the college student driving an Uber car part-time to graduate debt-free.

Lincoln's dream is alive every day nand at every moment when people choose to buy a home, start a business, enroll in school, save for the future. They know such commitments aren't easy and don't pay off right away. But they're worth doing. If Americans are working harder than ever earning less than they once did, our government and our leaders should step up, offer a plan, fix what's wrong - or they should step aside.

Let's ask how we got to this point. Let's start in Detroit.

Because in a sense, the troubles Detroit faces are an echo of the troubles facing Washington, D.C.

Decades of big government policies, petty politics, impossible-to-meet pension promises, chronic mismanagement and broken services — combined with a massive loss of jobs and competitiveness in the auto industry — drove tens of thousands of people from this city and this region.

For example: Detroit under the previous administration was so proud of shutting down businesses that hadn't paid their licenses and fees, they bragged about it in press releases. The city threatened nearly 900 businesses with closure and followed through on nearly 400 businesses, shutting them down.

Many of these were small businesses run out of homes and alley-facing garages, run by people who just wanted to take that first step up the economic ladder.

One of those business owners, Derek Little, had a simple way to describe his frustration: I'm running a legit business... They could be doing something better.

And while the city was shutting down people who were trying to build a business ...it couldn't even do its job correctly: The city was losing money writing parking tickets.

Of course, on Amtrak they lose money on the snack car. They literally have a captive audience.

But government inefficiency isn't just irritating. It's instructive. If the government can't collect parking fines, or sell snacks on a train, why would government know how to enable every citizen to move up in life?

That's why I launched the Right to Rise PAC. So that someone would speak for people who don't want to wait for the government to deliver prosperity. They want to earn it themselves. Government isn't the only issue here. There is far more at work. But in a sense, fixing government policy is the easiest problem to solve. And it's the one most responsive to the demands of voters.

So, I am getting involved in politics again, because that's where the work has to begin. The opportunity gap is the defining issue of our time.

More Americans are stuck at their income levels than ever before. It's very hard for people to go from the bottom rungs of the economy to the top. Or even to the middle.

This should alarm you. It alarmed me. The problem starts when we fear the one thing that can help unlock the economic status quo: The freedom to compete and work as a team to build great things.

Competition is messy. But it's essential. We've all seen the battles: The taxicab companies fight against web-enabled car services. The restaurants fight against the food trucks. The brick-and-mortar retailers fight against the Internet companies.

I'm not here to take sides. And I don't think government should either. Because when government protects one business against another, or tilts the field of competition, there is a clear loser: Anyone who wants to create something as a team. Anyone who wants to innovate and shake things up. Anyone who wants more choices and better service. And we know that in the end, standing against competition and dynamism is a losing battle.

In 1955, 60 years ago, the Fortune 500 list first appeared. Of the companies on that list, fully 88% don't even exist today or have fallen away. Today's Fortune 500 will be replaced by new companies that are just starting today.

This is hard for some people to accept. Because entrenched interests do not like giving up what they have. That's why they fear small competitors who have nothing to lose. You know the stories: The president of Michigan Savings Bank imparted some wisdom to the young lawyer for a small start-up company: The horse, the bank president said,'is here to stay, but the automobile is only a fad.'

The small start-up that lawyer represented... was the Ford Motor Company.We can laugh about it now because Ford and the other innovators of Detroit had the economic freedom to compete and to prove the doubters wrong.

Our nation has always valued such economic freedom because in economic freedom, each citizen has the power to propel themselves forward and upward.

This really isn't understood in Washington D.C. And you can see why: It's a company town.

And the company is government. It's all they know.

For several years now, they have been recklessly degrading the value of work, the incentive to work, and the rewards of work.

We have seen them cut the definition of a full-time job from 40 to 30 hours, slashing the ability of paycheck earners to make ends meet. We have seen them create welfare programs and tax rules that punish people with lost benefits and higher taxes for moving up those first few rungs of the economic ladder.

Instead of a safety net to cushion our occasional falls, they have built a spider web that traps people in perpetual dependence. We have seen them waive the rules that helped so many people escape welfare.

The progressive and liberal mindset believes that to every problem there is a Washington D.C. solution. But that instinct doesn't solve any problem, other than the problem of how to keep Washington's regional economy well-lubricated.

And the cost is enormous!

Let's say you're a hard-working middle-class family. You work hard. You pay your mortgage on time. As President Obama likes to say: You play by the rules.

But for President Obama, one of the rules is this: He reserves the right to change the rules.

Just last month, he thought it was a good idea to tax 529 college savings plans. Remember: 529s were created to be tax-free ways to save for college. Millions of people started them for their kids and grandkids. So it's no surprise people hated the president's idea. And he dropped it. But it was an instructive lesson in the liberal and progressive mindset. Saving for college is the responsible thing to do. But instead of embracing 529s, the liberals moved to tax them.

It's frustrating. But it shows you how they think.

And if you want to know how they act, ask Sharon DeLay. Sharon founded a recruiting company in Westerville, Ohio. Here's what she said: It's as if the politicians and regulators in Washington want me to fail - and spend all their time thinking up new ways to ensure that I do ...You either want me to be the engine of the economy or you don't!

Here's a message for Sharon and millions like her: There's a better way.Let'sine this path first by the core principles of a Right to Rise society because once we do that, the policies, the laws and the way forward will be much clearer.

Let's start with the first principle: When it comes to ensuring opportunity and a chance at success, the most important factor isn't government. It's a committed family.

Social scientists across the ideological spectrum agree on this: If you want to predict whether someone will graduate from school, go to college and move forward in life, just find out one thing: Were they raised in a loving household by two parents? If you didn't, you can overcome it, but it's very hard. If you did, you have a built-in advantage in life.

The evidence is overwhelming. Every child has a greater chance at opportunity when they are raised by loving, caring and supportive parents and a committed family. That isn't the work of government. But it's critical that governmental leaders recognize that and support it.

A second principle: Growth above all. A growing economy, whether here in Detroit or throughout this country is the difference between poverty and prosperity for millions. If you want to close the opportunity gap, grow the economy. This is a principle that concentrates the mind.

If a law or a rule doesn't contribute to growth, why do it? If a law subtracts from growth, why are we discussing it? And for what it's worth, I don't think the US should settle for anything less than 4% growth a year — which is about twice our current average. At that rate, the middle class will thrive again.

And in the coming months, I intend to detail how we can get there, with a mix of smart policies and reforms to tap our resources and capacity to innovate, whether in energy, manufacturing, health care or technology.

Third: The right to rise depends on a government that makes it easier to work than not work.

That means fewer laws restricting the labor market and reducing the penalties that come with moving up from the lowest rungs of the ladder.

Fourth: To address the income gap, let's close the opportunity gap, and that starts with doing everything we can to give every child, from every neighborhood, a great education. This won't happen overnight — trust me, I know. But I also know it works. And it takes every tool we have.

Accountability for teachers and school administrators, assessment of student learning, high standards, and choices. These key elements of school reform work and we have the results to prove it.

Finally, let's embrace reform everywhere, especially in our government. Let's start with the simple principle of who holds the power. I say give Washington less and give states and local governments more.

We make multi-billion dollar infrastructure decisions based on a labor law written in 1921. President Obama proposes making rules on the Internet using laws written in the 1930s. We regulate global airlines using laws written for railroads. Our immigration laws were written a half-century ago.

Governmental policy seems frozen, incapable and fearful of change. It is in the way. And we deserve better than this.

If we don't transform ourselves to meet new challenges and seize new opportunities, we know what happens next. Look around this city. In its history there is a warning to all of us.

A century ago, Detroit was America's great innovation hub. The Silicon Valley of its age.

It was bigger than Chicago. It was the nation's wealthiest city in 1960.

Detroit put the world on wheels and created the jobs that lifted millions of Americans into the middle class.

This city was the arsenal of Democracy and delivered the arms needed to defend freedom across two oceans.

Detroit promised prosperity and it delivered.

Sons of sharecroppers coming up from the South, farmhands from the Upper Midwest, immigrants who spoke Polish, Yiddish, Greek and Arabic.

Their children settled. They prospered. And some of their grandchildren are in this room today.

And now, you are rebuilding this city. I know you will be that great city again. Because Americans by nature work and strive to succeed.

It is already happening.

In the Madison Building, not far from here, new companies are rising. One of them, iRule, is led by two young men, one born in Russia, the other in Israel. They left secure jobs as automotive engineers to start their business in 2009. At the very bottom of the recession. Here's what one of them, Itai ben Gal said: 'We know Detroit has its baggage, but we believe we're part of the solution.'

Three years later, they have 21 employees, including Itai's father, who is the CFO.

And this activity is happening downtown, in an area once ignored.

Another Detroit entrepreneur grew up in the suburbs. He rarely came downtown as a child. But today, he works here. He lives here. This is what he said: 'We see the city for what it can be... not for what it was.'

That's how we should see everything. Not just Detroit.But in all of America.

I know some in the media think conservatives don't care about the cities.

But they are wrong. We believe that every American and in every community has a right to pursue happiness. They have a right to rise.

So I say: Let's go where our ideas can matter most. Where the failures of liberal government are most obvious. Let's deliver real conservative success.

And you know what will happen?

We'll create a whole lot of new conservatives.

I know, because I've lived it.

I come from Miami, another city that faced the same struggles as Detroit.

In my city, the schools were failing, opportunity was scarce and for too many, simply being born in the wrong neighborhood meant the American Dream was cruelly out of reach.

I joined with my friend, Willard Fair, a courageous leader in the civil rights movement.

We decided that the right to rise, was also a civil right. So we went to work to change education in Florida.

While there's much more to do, we saw lives changed and hope restored.

You can do it, here in Detroit. We can do it, across America.

Because this morning, 320 million Americans got up ... and they are on 320 million different paths of life.

It's our goal to see them succeed.

And it's our responsibility to do everything possible to help them.

Because by their success, they will not only build prosperity for themselves. They will renew the promise of this nation when everyone, has the right to rise.

Those are the stakes. That's why we're here. Please join me in this great cause.

Thank you and may God bless you, and may God bless America.

Dear Jake,

I attended a meeting on Monday, October 5, in New York with Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Zarif, hosted by the Atlantic Council (whose Iran Task Force I chair) and the New America Foundation (with Bill Leurs and Tom Pickering). This is the third meeting I have had with Zarif.

He made the following points in a 20 minute speech and answers to questions:

1. The nuclear agreement was a victory for diplomacy and dialogue. What was a success for Iran is not a defeat for the U.S. This is not a zero sum game. The agreement is the best insurance against an Iranian breakout. The “fabricated nuclear material cannot be used for making a bomb.” We are willing to take “your nuclear fuel, so we will not need to make any of our own.”

2. Implementation of the agreement requires transparency and a commitment to abide by its terms, and Iran will do so.

3. The US seems intent in terms of sanctions relief to do the “least it can do”. He is “concerned with the tough interpretation of sanctions relief by OFAC. Moreover, the New York banking authorities are complicating things even more with financial sanctions, making it difficult for European companies to get the funds to invest in Iran.
This sends negative signals Treasury and DOJ should give a reasonable interpretation to the lifting of sanctions. Otherwise, it will make it difficult for even European companies to do business in Iran. Here again, the U.S. seems to view sanctions relief as a zero sum game, in which whatever helps Iran is bad for the U.S. It is in everyone’s interest if Iran’s economy recovers, and gets out of a “siege mentality”.

4. Iran does not expect American companies to do business with Iran because of continuing U.S. sanctions. But under existing rules, many U.S. companies can do business with Iran. For example, Iran needs 400 new aircraft, and can purchase them from either Boeing or Airbus. There is no legal bar to Boeing selling its aircraft to Iran, with an OFAC license. Likewise, humanitarian goods can be sold to Iran from the U.S. now, including pharmaceuticals and medical devices made by GE. Iran can be a “huge market” for U.S. goods and services.

5. Even if the lifting of sanctions will not help U.S. companies that much, compared to European companies, eventually this will happen.

6. Just as politics in the U.S. are difficult, they are also “difficult” in Iran .A member of the Iranian parliament said that Zarif’s hands should be cut-off for shaking hands with President Obama at the United Nations this week. It is wrong to think that all decisions in Iran are made by one man.

7. Iran and the U.S. have negative views of each other. The U.S. sees Iran as determined to get a nuclear weapon, while Iran sees the U.S. as trying do dominate the Middle East.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

8. He spent a good deal of time discussing Saudi Arabia. He said since his first days in office he has sought a dialogue, but Iranian overtures have been rebuffed. He was told by the Saudis, "leave the Arabs to ourselves". He recounted that he left the World Economic Forum immediately and made the long trip to Saudi Arabia for the funeral of King Abdullah. But he received barely a handshake for his efforts. Saudi Arabia also sees relations with Iran as a zero sum game. The Saudis think ISIS can help them against Iran. Iran has sent a new Ambassador to Saudi Arabia who they trust, and he hopes this will help the relationship.

9. I asked him about the use of the unfrozen assets, and I said that people here will be looking to see if Iran spends its new-found funds on its people and investments, of if substantial amounts go to Hezbollah. He gave a tough response. "The money is our money and it was illegally blocked by the U.S., and what we do with our money is purely our business." He further said, "You spend 10 times more in the Middle East than we do, and what has it gotten you?" He contended Iran would only get $40 billion and we will spend it for our people.

10. If we give funds to Hezbollah, they are a positive force in Lebanon, and have kept ISIS out of Lebanon.

11. Regarding Syria, he said the presence if Russian military equipment and personnel was a good thing for Syria. He contented that "four months ago ISIS was close to Damascus, and this necessitated Russian help to beat them back. Iran "does not intend to send troops to Syria, but we will play a greater role in training and supporting the Syrian Army. He asked rhetorically, "what good has the U.S. and its allies done in combating ISIS?" He said flatly, "We are cooperating with Russia in Syria." The U.S., he asserted, has a dilemma in Syria. If you stick with the rebels, your support is not likely to be effective; if you support Assad you are changing your policy. He asserted that

12. Regarding the 1994 AMIA bombing and the recent controversy over the death of the prosecutor Nisman, shortly before he was to deliver a report to the Argentine Congress, the person who alleged Iran blew up AMIA has been proven a fraud and liar. He did saw shortly after Nisman's death that it was a suicide, but he was simply following the statement made by Argentina's democratically elected leader. "It is a mistake to allege Iran blew up AMIA." The Saudis are behind all of this with their incorrect allegations.

13. Robin Wright of the Post, asked him about the release of the prisoners, including Jason, their journalist. Zarif said he knows Jason and would like to see him released, but he is an Iranian citizen, and an Iranian court found him guilty of passing along intelligence to a foreign power He is subject to Iranian law. "It will be hard to justify their release to our public." However, he added, "I am ready for a negotiation, but it will have to involve the release of Iranian prisoners in the U.S." The US "says we should be flexible", but you are not flexible with our prisoners". But he would like to see them back in the U.S. and their prisoners back in Iran.

Best wishes,

Stu Eizenstat

P.S. On the unrelated issue of TPP, I am disappointed with the position Hillary took. Of course, I am fully aware of the politics of the issue, but she could have stressed the geo-political advantage of passing it, in terms of combating Chinese influence in Asia. Also, the environmental groups seem positive. She might have dealt with the deficiencies in the trade area by bilateral side agreements, as with NAFTA. Her position will complicate an already difficult fight to pass TPP; its defeat would be a gift to China.

Subject: Iran and the Arab World after the Nuclear Deal: Rivalry and Engagement in a New Era

Dear Colleagues,

The Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action between Iran and the P5+1 presents significant implications for the future order of the Middle East. But how it will do so remains uncertain.

Will it shift Iranian foreign policy toward greater cooperation and reconciliation or will it produce greater Iranian regional empowerment and aggressiveness instead? How do Iran's Arab neighbors assess the nuclear agreement and envision the future role of Iran in the region?

To help us understand this debate and answer these and related questions, the Belfer Center's Iran Project is publishing Iran and the Arab World after the Nuclear Deal: Rivalry and Engagement in a New Era. Our report has gathered a range of opinions and views from 15 leading experts based in the Arab world to assess the impact of the nuclear agreement on Iran-Arab security relations.

Politico: "2016: It's on"

By Kenneth P. Vogel and Tarini Parti

October 29, 2014, 5:05 a.m. EDT

Prospective presidential candidates and their supporters are spending money like it's 2016.

Groups allied with 15 of the top presidential prospects have raised $89 million and spent $87 million this election cycle as they gear up for 2016, with a focus on building campaign infrastructure and making inroads in key primary states, according to a POLITICO analysis of reports filed this month with the Federal Election Commission and Internal Revenue Service.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The groups connected to Hillary Clinton alone have brought in $25 million.

POLITICO's analysis included committees allied with prospective 2016 Democratic candidates Hillary Clinton, Martin O'Malley, Deval Patrick, Bernie Sanders and Elizabeth Warren and possible 2016 Republicans Paul Ryan, John Bolton, Jeb Bush, Chris Christie, Ted Cruz, Mike Huckabee, Bobby Jindal, Rand Paul, Rick Perry, Marco Rubio and Rick Santorum.

The affiliated groups run the gamut from campaign committees to leadership PACs to technically independent super PACs to non-profits, and mostly have stated purposes separate from 2016, including helping allies in their 2014 races. They have ramped up activity this summer, raising $16 million between July 1 and the end of September, and spending $5.4 million collecting data on donors, voters and grassroots supporters.

Not long ago, that level of campaign finance activity would have been expected during the campaign itself, but the break-neck pace before the 2014 midterms hints at just how expensive it will be to build a top-tier presidential campaign operation in 2016.

Anyone hoping to be competitive likely will have to bring in between $100 million and $150 million next year before the first voters even go to the polls, said Michael Toner, a former FEC Commissioner who served as a top lawyer on the presidential campaigns of Republicans George W. Bush in 2000, Fred Thompson in 2008 and Tim Pawlenty in 2012.

"That's just the entry fee," Toner said. "It's what you're likely going to need to raise to organize on the ground simultaneously in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and other early states, while also getting on the ballot in those states, which is extremely onerous and expensive."

Only one of the possible White House aspirants included in the analysis — Rep. Paul Ryan of Wisconsin — is actually on the ballot Tuesday, and he faces only token opposition. But major swaths of the spending reflected in his finance reports — like that of the other groups analyzed — could unquestionably help form the foundation of a presidential campaign apparatus.

"The keys to being treated as a viable candidate are raising your national profile, building a network of donors and building a grassroots network, and it takes money to do all those things," said GOP lawyer and fundraiser Charlie Spies. In 2008 and 2012, Spies helped Mitt Romney build political operations that elevated presidential campaign preparation into a political sub-industry unto itself.

The 2014 activity reflected in recent finance reports – likely the last full round of disclosures before candidates begin declaring for the presidency – offers a glimpse at how various politicians might approach their White House bids.

The strategies are as varied as the prospective candidates' ideologies – from Florida Sen. Rubio's flashy $400,000 in reported ad spending boosting 2014 candidates to the $1-million-plus think tank Louisiana Gov. Jindal's allies created to promote his policy ideas to the populist barnstorming of Sens. Sanders of Vermont and Paul of Kentucky. In the third quarter, as they hopscotched the country rallying voters in targeted races (many of which just happened to be in key 2016 states), they racked up travel costs totaling $27,000 and $118,000, respectively, ranging from charter airfare ($11,000 for Sanders and $59,000 for Paul) to rental cars ($700 for Sanders and $3,000 for Paul).

Paul's PAC even purchased $337.03 in "apparel" at the Men's Wearhouse in Omaha, Neb., around the time the senator, whose offbeat wardrobe has been the subject of curiosity, swung through town en route to adjacent Iowa to campaign for Senate candidate Ben Sasse.

Yet none of this is close to the money and activity behind Clinton.

If the former Secretary of State and New York senator wins the Democratic nomination, the committees supporting her could raise $1.7 billion or more – far eclipsing the record-breaking $1.2 billion raised by those supporting President Barack Obama's 2012 reelection, Toner predicted. In his estimation, Clinton's campaign committee alone would have the potential to raise $1 billion, with an additional $500 million that could come into the Democratic Party committees, plus $200 million or more going to outside groups devoted to putting her in the White House.

"She is the 10,000-pound gorilla," Toner said. Her mere presence in the primary "would likely have a ripple effect on how much money other candidates are going to have to raise in 2015 just to be in the ballgame."

Allies of the putative Democratic frontrunner have already built a shadow campaign operation unlike anything in modern American political history.

The committees that form the core of the Clinton machine – the super PACs Ready for Hillary, American Bridge and Priorities USA – combined with the idling Senate committee that houses her once-coveted (and still profitable) email list brought in $3.8 million in the third quarter alone. The groups spent $1.4 million in those three months reaching out to existing and potential supporters and donors.

Priorities USA, which was created to support Obama's reelection, after 2012 morphed into the advertising arm of the Clinton apparatus, quietly building analytical models for an on-air assault to nuke any rival who challenges the former secretary of state. Last month, it spent $41,000 for research from NCEC Services, Inc., which specializes in creating voter outreach strategies. It's part of an effort "laying the groundwork to run the most data-driven, targeted independent expenditure in presidential campaign history," boasted Priorities spokesman Peter Kauffmann.

Ready for Hillary, which set out to mobilize grassroots support around a potential Clinton campaign, has the biggest overhead of any of the groups in this analysis. It has 35 staffers spread across 14 states and owns a bus that has been crisscrossing the country holding rallies. In the last three months, it paid nearly $650,000 in salary and human resource-related expenses and $227,000 in travel costs.

It's building a voter file it hopes to use to benefit a potential Clinton campaign, and it paid $45,000 for data from the Democratic parties that host the first two primary contests – Iowa and New Hampshire. The group's spokesman Seth Bringman said that data "enables us to develop an even more robust database of supporters who can be activated the moment Hillary makes a decision."

The group has highlighted its small donor network — an area where Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign lagged behind Obama's — but it has also worked to line up affluent Democrats to support Clinton. In the third quarter, it spent $160,000 on 10 different finance consultants, plus $596,000 on direct mail-related costs. Among the new donors from whom it received maximum $25,000 donations were private space travel entrepreneur Laetitia Garriott de Cayeux, ESPN executive Marie Donoghue (who oversees Nate Silver's fivethirtyeight.com) and CarMax co-founder Austin Ligon.

O'Malley, the Maryland governor who is the Democrat most aggressively laying the groundwork for a potential challenge to Clinton, has been working assiduously to boost his national profile among donors and activists alike.

His O'Say Can You See PAC paid $45,000 in the third quarter to a firm called Revolution Messaging that created slick movie-trailer-style videos touting O'Malley's record. In one gauzy biographical short, a narrator praises the "assault on hopelessness" O'Malley launched when he ran for mayor of Baltimore by "walking its mean streets … assaulted by batteries and bottles hurled by drug dealers angered at having their business interrupted."

O'Malley's PAC also spent $32,000 on a pair of finance consultants who specialize in part on high-dollar fundraising, with one receiving a $3,000 bonus at the end of last month. The arm of the PAC that can accept unlimited checks scored sizable contributions from Washington Capitals owner Ted Leonsis ($10,000), Milwaukee County Executive Chris Abele, a wealthy businessman, ($25,000) and trial lawyer John P. Coale, a longtime O'Malley friend and the husband of Fox News host Greta van Susteren ($21,715 – mostly in-kind contributions for transportation).

The possible rival Clinton's backers fear most — Massachusetts Sen. Warren — has shown little appetite to challenge Clinton, but her political committees' reports show why she could be formidable. She has the potential to raise huge sums from a wide small donor base. Her campaign committee and PAC in the third quarter raised more than $955,000 — about two thirds of which came from small donors. While a super PAC formed to coax her into the race raised only $58,000, it did make its first payment – $6,000 last month – to a fundraising firm called Bulldog Finance Group focusing partly on drumming up big-donor support.

The GOP pre-presidential field is much wider open — and more competitive. Operatives for some of the prospective candidates were reluctant to detail their fundraising or infrastructure-building strategies for fear of tipping off competitors to their ideas.

Sens. Paul, Cruz of Texas and Rubio of Florida, along with Rep. Ryan seem to be in almost a race of sorts to campaign for – and contribute to – as many GOP candidates as possible in the run-up to the midterms. They all rushed to embrace a new wrinkle in fundraising – setting up a joint committee connecting their campaign committees and leadership PACs that can accept bigger checks than either component committee alone. And many of them are competing for the attention of the same big donors.

Huckabee – the Fox News host and former Arkansas governor who mounted a scrappy but under-funded campaign for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, has suggested he might run again in 2016 if he had support from rich super PAC backers. But his Huck PAC committee in the third quarter dropped $511,000 — three quarters of its total spending — on direct mail fundraising. While that's a high burn rate for a PAC that raised less than $1 million in the less three months, direct mail is considered the most effective way to cultivate the older voters who seem to form the core of Huckabee's fan base and donor network.

Cruz's three committees spent $119,000 on printing and postage costs often associated with direct mail and $60,000 on fundraising phone calls (another go-to technique for reaching older supporters). But Cruz's groups also spent $81,000 on database management and digital consulting costs typically associated with targeting a younger audience.

Likewise, a pair of PACs affiliated with former United Nations Ambassador John Bolton, who has signaled interest in a run for the GOP presidential nomination, in the third quarter paid $100,000 to top GOP online fundraising firm Campaign Solutions and $15,000 to Nova List Company for lists to prospect. Bolton also scored big checks from Zionist philanthropist Cherna Moskowitz (who has given $300,000 to his super PAC) and beer baron Pete Coors ($25,000).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Govs. Jindal and Perry of Texas have created leadership PACs to fund their political travels and donations, but their supporters also started non-profit groups registered under a section of the tax code – 501(c)4 – that allows them to accept unlimited and anonymous checks to promote their policy platforms and records.

The Jindal-linked 501(c)4, America Next, has raised more than $1 million since it was founded late last year, according to Timmy Teepell, a former Jindal chief and staff who is a partner at OnMessage, Jindal's consulting firm.

America Next is run by Romney Iowa and New Hampshire alumna Jill Neunaber, who also runs Jindal's leadership PAC, which has footed the bill for him to travel the country and donate to candidates, largely in Iowa and New Hampshire.

Teepell described the nonprofit as "open source coding for policy proposals," such as Jindal's early support for over-the-counter contraception. It has recently been championed by Republicans in high-profile Senate races including Colorado's Cory Gardner and North Carolina's Thom Tillis — both of whom also happen to be OnMessage clients.

Perry's close confidants last year created Americans for Economic Freedom with $200,000 of left-over cash transferred from the coffers of a super PAC that supported his presidential bid in 2012. The nonprofit has run ads around the country praising Perry's job creation record.

Perry's leadership PAC also spent more than $17,000 on fundraising and digital targeting, including $13,000 to Targeted Victory, the influential firm that ran Romney's digital operation, and $4,300 apparently for tee-shirts featuring his mug-shot from a booking on public corruption charges that critics contend are politically motivated. The shirts were offered for sale by the PAC at an event featuring Perry in August in New Hampshire.

Since July, it's donated more than $60,000 to Republican candidates in New Hampshire and more than $30,000 to those in Iowa.

Such donations are the ostensible purpose of the leadership PACs like those maintained by many would-be 2016 candidates. And while the total sums donated often pale into the comparison to the amounts spent on fundraising, travel and overhead, donations can help would-be White House aspirants collect chits in key states.

Ryan's committees have given the most in federal campaign contributions – $826,000 – through the end of last month, followed by Warren's ($458,000), Cruz's ($344,000), Bolton's ($342,000), Rubio's ($288,000), Ready for Hillary ($200,000) and Sanders' ($179,000).

A committee set up by former Florida Gov. Bush solely to raise money for GOP Senate candidates had passed through a total of more than $760,000 at the end of last month to Tom Cotton of Arkansas, Cory Gardner of Colorado, Joni Ernst of Iowa, Dan Sullivan of Alaska and Monica Wehby of Oregon. And, while Bush mostly lacks a campaign finance infrastructure to support his own presidential exploration, Toner asserted Bush could quickly fix that, and suggested he ultimately may be the only Republican who could keep up with Clinton in the money race. "He has a wide and deep donor network," Toner said.

Likewise, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie lacks an active political committee of his own, but he has used his work on behalf of the Republican Governors Association to further cultivate his already strong connections to major donors. He's expected to be able to quickly parlay that into an independent political operation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It could be trickier for Vice President Joe Biden, who has been privately suggesting to donors that he's going to run and that he would be a better candidate than Clinton. Never a stellar fundraiser in his own right, Biden resisted calls by his inner circle to establish a leadership PAC last year, and there's no evidence that he or his inner circle have taken any steps towards establishing a campaign vehicle in waiting.

Sources say former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb, who's more openly considering a 2016 run, is expected to established some sort of political committee after the midterms to pay for a bare-bones staff and travels around the country to gauge interest in a potential campaign.

But one operative who has worked with Webb on previous campaigns suggested he wouldn't try to catch-up to Clinton or even O'Malley in the pre-campaign arms race, both because that's not how he operates, and because it's not practical.

"Part of the appeal of Jim Webb is that any call to political service he has fulfilled has been because he sees a need for leadership and direction at a specific time, not as part of a lifelong plan," said the operative.

Plus, the operative added, the rapidly changing campaign finance landscape makes it difficult to predict what types of preparations will be most useful for 2016.

"There has been a significant shift in the past four years alone on who is motivated to give and how, as well as the size and frequency of contributions," said the operative. "I can only imagine that evolution will continue into 2016, especially after campaigns and voters see the outcome of the midterms and all the analysis is done."

National Journal: "Kirsten Gillibrand: It's 'Vital' That a Woman Becomes President in 2016"

By Rebecca Nelson

[Subtitle:] The junior senator from New York hopes it's Hillary Clinton, but she's positioning herself well if that doesn't happen.

Speaking to an intimate audience of almost exclusively women on Tuesday, Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand asserted that it was critical not only for Democrats to nominate a woman in 2016, but also for that woman to become president.

At a recording of the SiriusXM radio show "The Agenda" put on by the liberal women's group EMILY's List, where the New York Democrat appeared on a panel to discuss women's increasing influence in politics, Gillibrand didn't play coy about who the next woman president should be.

"I am very hopeful that Secretary Clinton will decide to run," she said. "I think she's the strongest candidate the Democrats could field."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gillibrand painted herself as one of Clinton's biggest supporters, emphasizing that she would pledge her full support to a Clinton run. But she also made sure to highlight her own legislative efforts to help women. Combatting sexual assault in the military, universal pre-kindergarten, and paid leave are all central to creating a better country for women, she said.

Less than ten minutes into the discussion, Democratic strategist Bill Burton, who was on the panel with the senator, made a veiled reference to the possibility of Gillibrand running. Smiling and angling toward the senator, Burton said he hopes his three-year-old son will see a woman president, "whether that's Hillary Clinton or somebody else."

Gillibrand has made it clear that as long as Clinton runs, she won't be–she told National Journal after the event that she'll support Clinton "110 percent." But her efforts to engage women voters point to a savvy politician playing the long game. Aligning herself with powerful women's groups sets her up to be Clinton's heir apparent as the voice for women in the Democratic party. After Clinton likely takes her turn in 2016, Gillibrand will be well-prepared to assume that role.

Fox News column: Media Buzz: Howard Kurtz: “Media pounce on Hillary’s jobs gaffe, float Jeb’s trial balloon”

By Howard Kurtz

October 29, 2014

Hillary Clinton’s gaffe about jobs is resonating for several reasons—not least because the media have decided she’s no Elizabeth Warren.

The media narrative du jour is that Hillary is out of step with the populist mood of the Democratic Party—as embodied by the Wall Street-bashing Massachusetts senator who many pundits are still hoping will challenge her. So they are guaranteed to pounce on any mistake that feeds Hillary’s image as an establishment figure who is struggling to be more like Liz.

It’s hard to believe that the former first lady managed to echo Barack Obama’s “you didn’t build that” blunder, given how long that bedeviled the president.

“Don’t let anybody tell you that corporations and businesses create jobs,” Hillary told a Boston rally. “You know that old theory, trickle-down economics. That has been tried, that has failed. It has failed rather spectacularly.” Perhaps it was no coincidence that Warren was also there, stumping for struggling gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley.

So the overwhelming Democratic front-runner wants it known that she doesn’t believe American businesses, whatever their faults, generate jobs?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That led to followup stories like this one in Politico:

“Hillary Clinton on Monday mopped up her botched statement from a rally in Massachusetts last week, making it clear she’d misspoken and hadn’t intended to deliver a fresh economic policy message.”

At another campaign stop, Clinton said: “Trickle-down economics has failed. I short-handed this point the other day, so let me be absolutely clear about what I’ve been saying for a couple of decades. Our economy grows when businesses and entrepreneurs create good-paying jobs here in America and workers and families are empowered to build from the bottom up and the middle out — not when we hand out tax breaks for corporations that outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas.”

The earlier comment—the one she now says was shorthand—was jarring coming from an establishment figure who is viewed, fairly or unfairly, as too cozy with the banking establishment. Hillary has also been collecting six-figure speaking fees from her appearances before corporate groups.

But the media really love this story because of the contrast with Warren. The pundits have turned this freshman lawmaker into the purest distillation of the liberal id, the crusader who wants to whack Wall Street on behalf of the little people.

Never mind that Warren has said again and again she’s fine with Hillary and isn’t running in 2016, the pundits can’t stand a vacuum. Hillary cruising to the nomination is kind of a dull story line. So what she says, especially on economic issues, has to be measured against a hypothetical Warren candidacy.

In National Review, Victor Davis Hanson took a swipe at her “plutocrat populism,” saying she had bemoaned the crushing costs of higher education in a speech at the University of Nevada at Las Vegas:

“One reason tuition and student indebtedness have soared — UNLV’s tuition is set to go up by 17 percent next year — is that universities pay exorbitant fees to multimillionaire speakers like Hillary Clinton. College foundations sprout up to raise money for perks that might not pass transparent university budgeting. Clinton — or her own foundation — reportedly charged a university foundation $225,000 for a talk lasting less than an hour. For that sum, she could have paid the tuition of over 320 cash-strapped UNLV students…

“Why do so many self-interested plutocrats indulge in populist rhetoric that is completely at odds with the way they live?”

But the New Republic says the GOP’s “obsession” with Obama’s you-didn’t-build-that mistake “revealed more damaging truths about the Republican Party than the gaffe itself revealed about Obama.” Rick Santorum is quoted as saying the Republican convention showcased all kinds of business owners but not a single factory worker.

“None of the Republicans pushing the ‘corporations and businesses’ line actually thinks Hillary Clinton meant to say that investment isn’t a component of economic growth, just as they know from their perches in congressional offices and at donor-dependent non-profits that the entrepreneur isn’t the solitary engine of job creation. But it’s clear they all still believe that riling up business elites by selectively quoting Democrats is a key to political success.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of course, Hillary may simply have made a verbal error having nothing to do with Elizabeth Warren. But after that "dead broke" book tour, she needs to avoid developing a reputation as gaffe-prone.

Meanwhile, Hillary's possible 2016 opponent showed a deft use of the press. I have no idea whether Jeb Bush will run, but he certainly sent a signal, via the New York Times, that he's leaning that way.

Was this some shadowy source that a reporter met in the Florida Everglades? Nope, it was the former governor's son who spoke to Peter Baker.

"'No question,' Jeb Jr. said in an interview, 'people are getting fired up about it — donors and people who have been around the political process for a while, people he's known in Tallahassee when he was governor. The family, we're geared up either way.'"

The piece says the two former presidents, George W. and George H.W., very much want Jeb to run. More important, Jeb's wife, Columba, who is most wary of the political pressure-cooker, has given the nod, says Jeb Jr.

To be sure, the Times has a to-be-sure paragraph:

"None of that means Jeb Bush will run. He has said he will decide by the end of the year, and could simply be keeping the possibility open to enhance his influence on the political stage. To some who have spoken with him in recent months, he has not exhibited the same fire that his father and brother did at this stage."

But consider this: Jeb Bush's other son, George P., told ABC's "This Week" he thinks it is "more than likely" that his father will run.

You don't have to be a brilliant political analyst to believe that both sons aren't shooting off their mouths without dad's permission. Jeb is revving his engines.

The Week: "This is how the GOP should respond to Hillary Clinton's trumpeting of a minimum wage hike"

By James Pethokoukis

October 29, 2014, 6:09 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Instead of blasting her as a leftist Obamacrat, maybe Republicans ought to rethink their own economic message

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kudos to Hillary Clinton for this clever bit of political jujitsu: At a rally last week for Massachusetts gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley, the presumed 2016 Democratic favorite said it was a higher minimum wage, not private enterprise, that really creates American jobs.

“Don't let anybody tell you that raising the minimum wage will kill jobs. They always say that. I've been through this. My husband gave working families a raise in the 1990s. I voted to raise the minimum wage and guess what? Millions of jobs were created or paid better and more families were more secure. … And don't let anybody tell you that, you know, it's corporations and businesses that create jobs. You know, that old theory, trickle-down economics. That has been tried. That has failed. It has failed rather spectacularly.” [Hillary Clinton]

Predictably, Republicans freaked out en masse, from Fox News to the conservative blogosphere. The consensus opinion: Clinton finally revealed her true leftist colors, not to mention her profound economic ignorance. Forget all her talk about hubby Bill's third-way centrism. Hillary Clinton clearly isn't a Clinton Democrat ready to drag her party back to the center. She's just another wealth-redistributing Obamacrat.

Clinton has since clarified her remarks to acknowledge that businesses and "empowered" families have a key role to play in a healthy U.S. economy. But it makes little political difference. Recall that President Obama also clarified his "You didn't build that" gaffe during the 2012 election season. The GOP still flogged the original remark to death, especially during the Republican National Convention, with both Mitt Romney and Paul Ryan making reference to Obama's line long after its expiration date.

So why am I suggesting that any of this might be good for Clinton? Because if she is the Democratic nominee, as we all assume she will be, her GOP opponents will surely be tempted to repeatedly cite her words as proof of fuzzy, liberal thinking on economic policy. And she might kind of like that, actually.

Indeed, maybe the whole point of the original comment was to goad Republicans into attacking her. Think about it. What did Romney and Ryan get for all their focus on society's builders and makers? Well, the ticket lost 81-18 to Obama-Biden among voters seeking a president who "cares about people like me." Most American aren't CEOs or running tech startups. And most saw little in Romney-nomics that would directly benefit them or address their worries about stagnant take-home pay or financing college.

A 2016 GOP campaign centered around "heroic entrepreneurs" rather than everyday middle-class concerns would probably fail badly again today. Voters care about economic growth, but they also think redistributionist policies — like raising the minimum wage and guaranteeing a minimum income — are better for economic growth than business tax cuts or reducing high-end personal tax rates. Attacking Clinton for trumpeting a minimum wage hike would probably backfire on the GOP — at least if all the party has is criticism.

So how should Republicans react? Surely not by rabidly attacking Clinton — but also not by reflexively mimicking the Democratic agenda. Instead, there is an opportunity for a positive, conservative reform message.

As far as the minimum wage goes, its impact on jobs is hardly settled science, despite Clinton's claim. A study out this week finds "the best evidence still points to job loss from minimum wages for very low-skilled workers — in particular, for teens." The U.S. economy generated 41 million private-sector jobs from 1980 through 2007 even as the minimum wage declinedby nearly a third in real terms. Clinton may have actually reversed the linkage between jobs and the minimum wage.

Expanding the Earned Income Tax Credit or some other wage subsidy would better target low-income workers while also less likely to cost jobs. Such a plan could be a key element of a new GOP middle-class agenda, along with tax breaks for parents, making college more affordable, and, yes, business tax cuts, since research suggests such reforms would raise worker wages.

If a renewed effort to support the beleaguered American middle class is how the GOP responds to Hillary, then her clever trolling may turn out to be too clever by half.

BuzzFeed: "Rand Paul Is Already Campaigning Against Hillary Clinton"

By Rosie Gray

October 28, 2014, 9:51 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] "Hillary Clinton says, 'Well, businesses don't create jobs.' Anybody believe that?"

OVERLAND PARK, Kansas — A certain likely Democratic presidential candidate has appeared, rhetorically, on the campaign trail in Kansas.

Hillary Clinton has become the target of ire from Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul as he stumps for Republican candidates here after Clinton said at a recent campaign stop that businesses and corporations do not create jobs.

Stumping for Kansas Sen. Pat Roberts and Gov. Sam Brownback on Tuesday, Paul criticized Clinton for the remark at more than one campaign stop. He's one of the most sought-after surrogates for Republicans in the midterms this year, and is a likely 2016 candidate himself. He told BuzzFeed News last week that he would be deciding about a potential presidential run in the spring.

"The president says, you didn't build that, it just sort of happened," Paul said in Wichita in an airport hangar rally at midday. "The plane just sort of came into being because it was a public road and a public library."

"Hillary Clinton comes up and she says, 'Businesses don't create jobs.' Anybody here think businesses don't create jobs?" Paul said. "I'm here today to endorse Pat Roberts and Sam Brownback, because you know what? They know that businesses do create jobs, and I hope you know that too."

Later in the day, in the Kansas City suburb of Overland Park, Paul offered the line again as he stood next to the podium, sort of in the style of Sen. Ted Cruz.

"Hillary Clinton says, 'Well, businesses don't create jobs.' Anybody believe that?" he said. The crowd roared.

At an event for Massachusetts gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley last week, Clinton said, "Don't let anybody tell you that it's corporations and businesses that create jobs. You know that old theory, trickle-down economics. That has been tried, that has failed. It has failed rather spectacularly."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton later walked back the remark, arguing that corporate tax breaks are not the source of economic growth. The former secretary of state has often been criticized from the left for being too corporate.

Obama and Clinton “are on another page, they’re on another planet, reading another book,” Paul said.

Wall Street Journal blog: Metropolis: “Bill Clinton Will Stump for Cuomo Thursday”

By Erica Orden

October 28, 2014, 1:59 p.m. EDT

On Thursday, New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo will get his second Clinton bump within the span of a week.

Former President Bill Clinton, who has been stumping for Democrats across the country , is expected to campaign for Mr. Cuomo on Thursday at a rally in New York City, according to people familiar with the matter.

A spokesman for Mr. Clinton declined to comment.

Mr. Cuomo, a Democrat facing reelection next week, rallied last Thursday with Hillary Clinton at a campaign event in Midtown, where Mrs. Clinton endorsed the governor and where Mr. Cuomo played coy about endorsing Mrs. Clinton for “something really, really, really big.”

Mr. Cuomo often touts his work in the Clinton administration, when he served as U.S. Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, on the campaign trail, even as in recent weeks he published a memoir that describes his resentment in 2002 over the Clintons’ reluctance to assist his failed first gubernatorial bid.

But he has been eager to trumpet their support this time around, and the Clintons have appeared ready to lend it.

While Mr. Clinton has recently stumped for more embattled Democrats, and in recent polls Mr. Cuomo maintains a roughly 20-point lead over his Republican opponent, Rob Astorino, the governor appears to be taking the advice Mrs. Clinton doled out during the rally last week.

“They think, ‘OK, the election’s over. We know who’s going to be the next governor,’” she said. “You can’t take anything for granted in an election. I know that from firsthand experience.”

USA Today: “Democrats, hoping to save Colorado, send Clinton”

By Trevor Hughes

October 28, 2014, 5:08 p.m. EDT

LAKEWOOD, Colo. — Democrats are pulling out all the stops, including back-to-back appearances by former president Bill Clinton, in their suddenly uphill battle to retain the state's governor's mansion and one of its two Senate seats.

President Obama won this state in both his presidential races, but now his unpopularity is weighing down Gov. John Hickenlooper and Sen. Mark Udall. Their challengers have repeatedly attacked them for being too close to a president who won this state twice but has seen his popularity plummet following a string of crises from the botched roll-out of his signature health care law to a renewed explosion of violence in Iraq.

Udall this summer skipped a rally Obama held on his behalf in Denver, and Republicans attacked the president for playing pool with Hickenlooper during a border crisis.

Recent polls show Udall losing to GOP challenger Rep. Cory Gardner, and Hickenlooper lagging slightly behind Republican Bob Beauprez after an early campaign in which both Democrats enjoyed broad name recognition and long-established fundraising systems. Outside groups have poured tens of millions of dollars into advertising that's been blanketing television, newspapers, radio and the Internet.

Clinton, the dean of the country's Democrats, appeared at Denver-area rallies Monday night and Tuesday morning, calling on voters to reject Republicans and keep the Democrats in office. He said Gardner and Beauprez are running on platforms that amount to "pop the president one more time."

"In a grown-up country... we join hands and work together. That's what Washington needs," Obama said Tuesday at a rally in suburban Denver.

Clinton sounded themes he's used for years, and which have proven popular with voters: community, bipartisanship and shared prosperity, while attacking trickle-down economics.

Udall's campaign argues that his extensive ground game will push him ahead of Gardner when the ballots are actually cast and counted, pointing out that polls in 2010 showed Democrat Michael Bennet losing his race right up until he won the state's junior senate seat. Bennet won by the equivalent of one vote in every Colorado precinct.

"In Colorado, like nowhere else, every single vote matters," Udall said. "We're going to show those outside groups you can't buy an election here. We are surging. We have momentum.

Hillary Rodham Clinton and Michelle Obama have also both visited Colorado in the closing weeks of the election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Last week, a USA TODAY/Suffolk University poll showed Gardner leading Udall by 46%-39%, a troubling finding for Democrats scrambling to hold control of the Senate. Five weeks ago, Udall held a 1- percentage-point lead in the same poll.

The poll also showed momentum for Beauprez: While he trailed Hickenlooper by 2 percentage points in September, he now leads the governor by 2 percentage points — movement in his direction, although the race is still well within the survey's 4.4-percentage-point margin of error.

The Udall-Gardner race is important because Colorado, Iowa and North Carolina have Democratic-held seats at the center of the battle over which party will control the Senate in January. Republicans, who are likely to keep control of the House, need to score a net gain of six seats to claim a majority in the Senate as well.

Republicans have also called in their party's big guns to build on their momentum: former Florida governor Jeb Bush is coming to the GOP stronghold of Douglas County on Wednesday, and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie is set to appear with Beauprez Thursday in the traditionally Republican area of Colorado Springs.

In a statement, Colorado GOP chairman Ryan Call said Clinton may have appeared with Udall on Tuesday but it's his ties with Obama that voters truly care about.

"President Clinton can attempt to bail out senator Udall with lofty clichés and sound bites, but his record speaks louder than words. The fact remains that senator Udall has forgotten the priorities of Colorado and chosen to align his votes with the failed policies of President Obama," Call said.

Las Vegas Review-Journal: “Bill Clinton rallies Dems in Vegas”

By Laura Myers

October 28, 2014, 8:55 p.m.

On a mission to save Nevada Democrats, former President Bill Clinton on Tuesday urged supporters at a rally to vote or suffer the consequences: a GOP-led Congress that would favor the rich over workers, try to repeal Obamacare and shut down the government “over and over and over.”

Clinton also said voters need to back Democratic candidates at the state and local levels because the policies they oversee affect Nevadans’ everyday lives and Republicans don’t support a minimum-wage hike or equal pay for women and want to roll back voter rights.

He said just because there’s no presidential election at stake is no excuse for Democrats to stay away from the polls, which would open the door to GOP victories on Nov. 4.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“A bunch of your life is shaped by people who aren’t on the ballot when we’re voting for presidents,” Clinton said, from governor to state treasurer to legislator. “This is a big deal.”

Laying out the high stakes, Clinton said the election will determine where Nevada and the nation go from here after recovering from the worst economic recession since the Great Depression.

“What’s really on the ballot is whether we go back to a trickle-down economy and whether only the rich get the benefits or whether we have shared opportunity and shared responsibility and the same rules apply to one another,” Clinton said.

The Clinton rally was aimed at boosting lackluster Democratic voter turnout during early voting as the GOP builds a healthy lead that could sweep Republicans into the state’s five top offices and boot freshman U.S. Rep. Steven Horsford, D-Nev.

The 4:30 p.m. rally at the Springs Preserve came a week before the Nov. 4 election. Democrats said about 700 people attended the open-air event.

It was scheduled at the last minute after Republicans shocked Democrats by beating them every day in early voting so far and in every key race. That’s a reversal of recent trends in the battleground state, which President Barack Obama won twice.

Statewide, Democrats outnumber Republicans by more than 62,000 registered voters. But during early voting, Republicans have built a 17,166-ballot lead over Democrats as of Tuesday morning thanks to an aggressive registration drive and get-out-the-vote effort.

The GOP is even ahead in Clark County by 2,094 ballots. The Democratic stronghold, where three quarters of the Nevada population lives, is normally where the party dominates, building an election firewall, while the GOP is far stronger in rural Nevada, with Washoe County serving as the swing county in the swing state.

In Horsford’s district, Republicans had cast 2,094 more ballots than Democrats so far, although there are some 33,156 more registered Democrats than Republicans in the 4th Congressional District, which covers northern Clark County and all or part of six rural counties. Horsford’s GOP opponent is Assemblyman Cresent Hardy of Mesquite.

The two-week early voting period ends Friday, a few days ahead of Election Day.

Clinton, in his remarks, defended Obama’s Affordable Care Act. He said 230,000 more people in Nevada have health insurance under Obamacare. He said premiums are expected to rise 1 percent next year, a far cry from runaway costs in the past.

“This thing is working, and we need to make it better,” Clinton said, adding that a GOP-led Congress “will go up there and vote another 50 times” to kill it.

“They’ll just shut the government down, over and over and over again,” he added. “They want you to believe it (the election) is about Ebola and ISIS. If something happens in the paper, it’s the president’s fault and you ought to vote against Democrats.”

“I don’t like it when these politicians play blame games,” Clinton added.

Clinton said voters shouldn’t think they can’t make a difference.

“It does matter,” he said of the midterm election. “It matters as much as the next presidential election.”

Clinton’s wife, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, is likely to run for president in 2016, and Nevada would be key to her hopes of winning the White House.

Clinton’s appearance came after Democratic candidates urged the crowd to vote early and to each get 10 people they know to vote to make up for lost ground against the GOP.

Horsford attended the rally as well as U.S. Rep. Dina Titus, D-Nev., attorney general candidate Ross Miller, secretary of state candidate Kate Marshall, lieutenant governor candidate Lucy Flores, and Erin Bilbray, the Democrat challenging U.S. Rep. Joe Heck, R-Nev., who is expected to win a third term in the 3rd Congressional District.

This year, Democratic voters haven’t been excited by the midterm election when there’s no presidential or U.S. Senate contest at stake.

Also, the governor’s race is a sleeper after the Democrats failed to recruit a top-tier candidate.

As a result, the popular GOP Gov. Brian Sandoval has spent his time promoting Republican candidates, raising millions of dollars to help GOP contenders and, behind the scenes, rebuilding the GOP ground game into an electoral force.

State Sen. Mark Hutchison, R-Las Vegas, who is Sandoval’s pick to become lieutenant governor, is expected to defeat his Democratic opponent, Flores, a Latina whose campaign never took off as she was outspent and outgunned.

The other high-profile race on the ballot, between Miller and Republican Adam Laxalt, has suddenly become one to watch. Miller, the better-known and better-funded secretary of state, was considered the front-runner, but now Laxalt, an attorney who moved to Nevada a few years ago, could score an upset if GOP turnout continues to dominate.

Miller could survive if he gains enough crossover support from Republicans, something his father and adviser, former Nevada Gov. Bob Miller, enjoyed as the state’s longest-serving governor from 1989 to 1999. Laxalt is the grandson of former U.S. Sen. and Gov. Paul Laxalt, who dominated Nevada politics in the 1960s, ’70s and ’80s.

Washington Post column: Ruth Marcus: “Why Jeb Bush should run for president”

By Ruth Marcus

October 28, 2014, 7:52 p.m. EDT

Run, Jeb, run.

I mean it, despite two powerful arguments against a presidential run by Jeb Bush — one specific to the former Florida governor, one more generic.

Generic first, because it is the more compelling: The thought of a Republican president makes me shudder, largely because of the irreparable harm to the Supreme Court. Legislative and regulatory mistakes can be fixed, albeit at enormous cost and difficulty. (Think George W. Bush’s tax cuts.) Foreign policy blunders are harder to repair. (Think George W. Bush’s war in Iraq.)

But the real risk is the judicial legacy a Republican president would leave behind. By the time the next president takes office, three of the justices (Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Antonin Scalia and Anthony Kennedy) will be in their 80s.

With the exception of Scalia, a Republican replacement of any of them would likely tip the balance of the court firmly into the hands of its conservative justices, to the peril of the court and the country. The impact would be felt when George P. Bush — or Charlotte Clinton Mezvinsky — is running for president.

The Bush-specific objection is obvious from the previous sentence, and stated best by the prospective candidate’s own mother: America is not, or should not be, a dynastic nation.

“If we can’t find more than two or three families to run for high office, that’s silly,” Barbara Bush told C-SPAN this year. “I refuse to accept that this great country isn’t raising other wonderful people.”

The weakness of this argument is that it ignores the fact that Jeb Bush happens to be well-qualified to run for president. And it arises in the looming shadow of a presidential run by Hillary Clinton, another candidate whose qualifications extend far beyond her surname.

As a general matter — sure, Barbara Bush is right. The more expansive our political roster, the better. But in the context of 2016 — well, this gets to my “run, Jeb, run” argument. He and Clinton are two of the best-qualified candidates.

My argument for a Jeb Bush candidacy is also twofold: It would be good for Bush’s party and good for the country.

Good for Republicans not just because it would give them a better shot at the White House but because the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GOP has veered off the ideological rails.

Even the notion that Bush is seriously considering running — his son told ABC's Jonathan Karl that it is "more than likely" — is a comforting sign. Jeb Bush is not naive about the GOP's loony tendencies and the distorted ideological landscape of its nominating process. For him to be weighing the race indicates that he believes those extremist instincts can be tamed.

A Bush candidacy would deviate from party orthodoxy on numerous issues, most notably immigration and education reform; a Bush nomination would usefully yank the party toward the center.

On immigration, Bush favors granting undocumented immigrants the opportunity for legalized status, although not necessarily a path to full citizenship. "Yes, they broke the law, but it's not a felony," he said in April. "It's an act of love, it's an act of commitment to your family."

He has also been a champion of education reform efforts, including the new GOP heresy of backing national education standards known as Common Core.

And speaking of heresy: In 2012, when none of the party's presidential contenders would back a hypothetical budget deal of $1 in tax increases for $10 in spending cuts, Bush told the House Budget Committee he'd snap it up. "Put me in, coach," he said, adding, "This will prove I'm not running for anything."

Make no mistake: Bush is a conservative. But he is a conservative who believes in the role and capacity of government and in the imperative of bipartisan cooperation.

"Back to my dad's time and Ronald Reagan's time — they got a lot of stuff done with a lot of bipartisan support," Bush told Bloomberg View in 2012. Contrast that with Texas Republican Sen. Ted Cruz: "I don't think what Washington needs is more compromise."

And this is why a Bush candidacy would be good for the country as well. A saner Republican Party would produce saner, more productive politics.

A more extreme nominee might be easier for Democrats to beat. But what if they don't? I'd rather see the more reasonable Republican candidate, because I'd rather see the more reasonable Republican president.

Run, Jeb, run.

Reuters: "Kerry wants Keystone pipeline decision 'sooner rather than later'"

[No Writer Mentioned]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

October 28, 2014, 3:43 p.m. EDT

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry said on Tuesday during a visit to Canada that he would like to make a decision soon on TransCanada Corp's Keystone XL crude oil pipeline.

TransCanada has waited more than six years for the Obama administration to make a decision on the line, which would take as much as 830,000 barrels per day of Alberta tar sands crude to refineries on Texas' Gulf Coast.

The State Department is now awaiting the results of a court challenge on the line's routing through Nebraska and completing its own study on the need for the line before it makes a final recommendation to President Barack Obama on whether to grant the project a presidential permit. The permit would allow the line, which faces criticism from environmentalists, to cross from Canada into the United States.

While Kerry said he would like a quick decision on the project, he gave no hint as to when that would come.

"I certainly want to do it sooner rather than later but I can't tell you the precise date," Kerry told a joint news conference with Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird.

The delay has pushed up the cost of the line, which would run from Hardisty, Alberta, to near Houston. The company said last month that Keystone XL's original $5.4 billion estimate is likely half of what it will now cost to build the pipeline.

The Hill opinion: Lanny Davis: “To Republicans: Watch out for traps after midterms”

By Lanny Davis

October 28, 2014, 6:53 p.m. EDT

Most pundits are predicting a Republican takeover of the U.S. Senate next Tuesday. I am ready to go on record against the conventional wisdom: I predict Democrats will surprise the pundits on election night and hold the Senate, if only by a 50-50 margin, with Vice President Biden breaking the tie.

My slight-underdog picks of the night: Mark Pryor and Michelle Nunn, because their message of decency and bipartisanship are perfectly aligned with what voters want not only in their states of Arkansas and Georgia, respectively, but across the nation.

However, if Republicans win the Senate, I respectfully suggest they avoid premature celebration, for there are three traps looming for them if they misread the election results.

First, they could misinterpret their victory as a mandate to implement a hard-right agenda. Remember the aftermath of Newt Gingrich's House takeover in the 1994 midterms. The conservative revolutionaries attempted to pass draconian budget cuts, including in Medicare and Medicaid, caused two government shutdowns and attempted to impeach then-President Clinton on an entirely partisan basis — all contrary to public opinion. As a result, just four years later in the 1998 midterms, Democrats picked up five seats. This was the first time in 176 years (since 1822, under President James Monroe) that the non-presidential party had failed to gain seats in the midterm elections with a president in his second term.

The second mistake could be that the Republicans who now control both houses of Congress will be unable to resist the Tea Party base to roll back Democratic programs on an entirely partisan basis. If they do so, they will be ignoring all the current polling data showing voters opposing such partisan power plays. And they will own the results. For example, if Republicans repeal ObamaCare on party-line votes, they will have to explain why people with pre-existing conditions will no longer have health insurance if they attempt to find new insurance after losing their jobs.

Third, once the GOP is the majority party in both houses of Congress, Republicans will find it more difficult to suppress three powerful ideological groups within the party whose positions on key issues are way out of touch with most voters', according to national polls. These are 1) Tea Party extremists, who favor dismantling much of the federal government, including Social Security and Medicare as we know it; 2) Christian right true-believers, who believe in criminalizing all abortions, including involving rape and incest; and 3) the New Isolationists, whose positions at times seem reminiscent of the America First movement of the late 1930s. As the majority party in both houses, the GOP will have lost its excuses not to enact legislation consistent with these extreme views, even though doing so will likely alienate many thoughtful Republican conservatives.

Which leads me to my warning for my fellow Democrats: If we lose the Senate next Tuesday night, we have to resist the advice of those pundits and strategists who will misinterpret the results as proof the party needs to be more strident in demonizing those who disagree with us.

Here it is important to remember the lessons of Bill Clinton's two presidential campaigns and two terms as president.

Clinton's economic and social policies were progressive by any definition: increasing taxes on the wealthy, pro-choice, pro-environment regulation, pro-minimum wages, etc. But he also focused during his two presidential campaigns on unifying themes addressed to the middle class and individual responsibility. In doing so, he won states now deemed irretrievably "red" by many, such as West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Arizona, Arkansas and Montana. Barack Obama's historic campaigns and brilliant grassroots organization carried on this broad electoral college base to the advantage of future Democratic presidential candidates.

It appears that most Democrats are happy with watching the Republicans head over the cliff trying to prove who has the purest ideology of all and don't wish to join them in such an exercise. Of course they want vigorous competition for the nomination. But unlike Republicans, they prefer candidates who can civilly debate fact-based solutions and can effectuate bipartisan compromises to break the gridlock in Washington.

Such Democrats (this writer included) believe, as President Obama has said frequently, that elections matter.

Bloomberg: "Why is Hillary Clinton Not Cutting Television Ads?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Lisa Lerer

October 28, 2014, 11:20 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] The prospective 2016 presidential candidate is the Democrats star attraction. So why don't they want her in their television ads?

Hundreds of thousands of ads have run millions of times during the 2014 campaign. Amid that flood of endorsements and attacks, slogans and statistics, it was easy to overlook the web ad put out on Tuesday by Kentucky Senate candidate Alison Lundergan Grimes. The web-only spot features former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton at a rally in Louisville, delivering a impassioned argument for the Democratic challenger.

It's a very standard spot that stands out for one very significant reason: It's the only ad that Clinton has cut for a candidate this election cycle.

Though she's traveled the country for Democrats, headlining rallies from Colorado to North Carolina, Clinton has not lent any of her star power to any televised campaign ads. It's a strange discrepancy: While Clinton is one of—if not the most—requested surrogates for Democratic congressional campaigns, many seem far less seem eager to put her in their television ads.

Even the spot for Grimes, a long-time family friend of the Clintons, was online-only—a far less expensive proposition for a campaign than actually buying time to place an ad on television. And it used footage captured two weeks ago at a rally Clinton held for Grimes in Louisville, rather than any new video.

Old footage of Clinton was also heavily featured in a House Majority PAC spot, where the Democratic Super PAC slammed Virginia Republican Barbara Comstock for her work as a congressional staffer in the 1990s focused on investigating the Clinton administration.

But mostly, Clinton has kept to fundraising appeals and energizing voters. She's hosted a series of high-dollar fundraisers, including one for female senate candidates at her home in Washington. Democrats need "all hands on deck," she wrote in an e-mail sent last month by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

While Hillary stays off TV, her husband has been burning up the airways. He's appeared in at least five ads for candidates.

"Sean Maloney’s got a better jobs plan. He’s got a better budget plan. He’s got a better education plan. He’s got a better plan for the future," says the former president in a spot for the New York congressional candidate, a former Clinton administration staffer.

In Maryland, he urges voters to back gubernatorial candidate Anthony Brown in a spot featuring a shot of Clinton walking besides the Democrat.

And he also lent his support for Grimes, who's father was a former state Democratic party chairman. (As a teenager, Grimes famously handed Clinton a bouquet of flowers during his inauguration celebration.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I chose Alison," Clinton says in a spot for, the Kentucky Democrat running for Senate.

"I'm honored to approve this message," says Grimes.

Hillary Clinton's spokespeople refused to comment on her ad appearances, or lack of them. But the answer may be found in her approval rating, which trails her husband's and has fallen since she left the State Department early last year.

In the recent Bloomberg News/Des Moines Register poll almost half—49 percent—of likely Iowa voters in the upcoming midterm elections say they have an unfavorable view of Clinton, while 47 percent rate her favorably. Fifty-seven percent of likely voters have a positive opinion of her husband, former president Bill Clinton, and 39 percent view him negatively.

So, while Democrats at campaign rallies may love Clinton, she remains a nationally divisive figure, one that's perhaps too divisive for state-wide television. She's in high-demand as a base motivator but faces a steeper climb with the general public—an issue that will certainly come back up in any Democratic presidential bid. Especially her own.

New York Times: "How Women Use Fashion to Assert Their Power"

By Vanessa Friedman

Of all the candidates running in next Tuesday's American midterm elections, only one, it seems to me, really has Halloween potential — which is to say, only one has succeeded in identifying herself closely enough with a specific sartorial semiology that a Pavlovian association is created in a viewer's mind. See the garment, think the person.

I am speaking, of course, of Wendy Davis, the Texas state senator and beleaguered gubernatorial candidate, as well as famed Mizuno sneaker wearer. A blond wig, a bright suit and those sneakers doth a costume create. Who needs masks when you have fashion?

Clothes have the power to define a person and a position, and though they are often seen as handicapping women in positions of authority, acting as a distraction from their achievements and substance, they can also be a strategic communication tool. One that is, ironically, more accessible to women than to men, who are stuck in a never-ending generic suit loop, forced to rely on the distinguishing characteristics of hair and tie color.

If in doubt, simply consider an exhibition that opened Wednesday in London at the Design Museum, entitled "Women Fashion Power." It has little to do with fashion as trend-driven designer vision, makes no aesthetic judgments and shies away from "power dressing" in the 1980s-Joan Collins-"Working Girl"-big-shouldered sense of the word. Rather, it focuses on image and authority in the public eye.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It felt like it was the right time to look at the rise of women in contemporary power roles, and how they view and use fashion to facilitate their place in the world,” said the co-curator, Donna Loveday, describing the show as one of the most ambitious the museum has done.

She and her fellow curator, the fashion historian and journalist Colin McDowell, began work on the exhibition 10 months ago. Designed by Zaha Hadid, the first woman to win the Pritzker Prize, it is laid out over almost 6,500 square feet in three parts: There is an analytic “corridor of power” that identifies 16 of the most influential dressers in history, starting with Hatshepsut, the Egyptian queen who used elements of male dress to establish authority after her husband’s death; culminating with Hillary Clinton; a 150-year timeline highlighting moments of public sartorial change (the “freedom from constraints” of the turn of the 20th century, the suffragist movement of the 1920s); and, most significant, a gallery of current power players who contributed a Q. and A. and favorite garments that reflect their words.

And since, as Ms. Loveday pointed out, “I don’t think there has really been an exhibit in a museum on the subject before,” it makes me wonder if this marks a turning point in our own relationship with fashion.

Just consider the fact that the show includes 25 high-profile women happy to go public with their thoughts on clothing. This includes the usual suspects: fashion professionals like Natalie Massenet, executive chairwoman of Net-a-Porter; the designer Vivienne Westwood; and the model Naomi Campbell. But it also includes Wei Sun Christianson, co-chief executive of Morgan Stanley Asia Pacific; Anne Hidalgo, the mayor of Paris (who also opened the exhibition); Alfiya Kuanysheva, chief executive of the Kazakhstan finance group BATT; and Kirsty Wark, the British broadcaster.

That, it seems to me, is an enormous and meaningful change in the conversation about achievement and gender. The idea that women whose power is undeniable and exists in traditionally male sectors like banking and politics might stand up and say, for the record and posterity, that clothes matter and require (and deserve) thought is, in my experience, unprecedented.

Even just three years ago, Michelle Obama, featured in the corridor of power, was denying giving any real consideration to clothing, announcing on “Good Morning America”: “Look, women, wear what you love. That’s all I can say. That’s my motto.”

(It just so happened that she loved wearing dresses from small American brands made by designers with notably diverse backgrounds, hence raising their profile on the international stage — but, hey, guess that was a coincidence.)

Fashion, like money — if not more than money — has been the off-limits topic, the subject whispered about and obsessed over, but rarely acknowledged in any nonpejorative way. It’s the invisible elephant in the room; like disinformation, it’s the tool everyone uses — and has used, as the exhibition makes clear, since Joan of Arc threw on some male armor — but refuses to admit they use.

“For a very long period, as women began entering the workplace and taking up roles traditionally occupied by men, the subject of dress was really put to one side, and treated as a frivolous distraction,” Ms. Loveday said.

Indeed, in a Daily Beast article last year about Ms. Davis and her sneakers, the liberal pundit Sally Kohn wrote that noting what women wear “undercuts the leadership of women and quashes their voice.” It seems to me, however, and this exhibition shows, that the situation is the opposite: What women wear is an embodiment of their voice, and identifying it helps identify their agenda (as it does with men, for that matter).

Granted, there were still women, and some very big names, that chose not to take part in the Q. and A. section of the Design Museum show. Ms. Loveday had Angela Merkel, Hillary Clinton and Queen Elizabeth II on her wish list, and all begged off from participating in the interactive, though they are referenced in the show. But, Ms. Loveday said, the reason she was given for their demurrals was not “I don’t want to be seen talking about that subject,” but rather “time.”

Before you say “Well, isn’t that the same thing and weren’t they just being polite,” consider the fact that a few years ago when I was trying to convene a panel of power women to do some image analysis for a different newspaper, the answer I heard over and over again from chief executives I approached was a straightforward: “Thanks for thinking of me, but I can’t be involved in any overt discussion of fashion. It would undermine my hard-won seriousness.” (I’m paraphrasing, but not that much.)

I’m not saying the time excuse should be taken at face value or is anything but an excuse (though it could be true), but the sheer fact that the women involved bothered to make it, as opposed to taking umbrage at the very idea they might think about clothing is, in my book, a step forward.

Besides, even without the active participation of such pivotal figures, it is meaningful to think that for six months visitors to the Design Museum will be able to read the property developer Morwenna Wilson’s words — “Jackets are very important to me because I am petite and a woman, yet one with responsibility and authority working in a male dominated industry, often with a team of people older than me” — and Ms. Christianson of Morgan Stanley attesting that “I decided that while I was working in a man’s world, I was not going to suppress my femininity in an attempt to blend in.”

“It’s an incredibly positive message,” said Ms. Loveday, referring not just to Ms. Christianson’s words, but her willingness to contribute. I would have to agree.

Even more pointedly, the fact that this is now a public subject of conversation, blessed by a major institution, suggests that perhaps during the coming British elections, which will take place in May but with campaigning beginning in January, image analysis may be discussed in formerly unheard-of ways — and vis-à-vis candidates of any gender. And given that after “Women Fashion Power” closes in London, it may travel to the United States, Asia and Europe, it could potentially play a part in the presidential election here,if Hillary Clinton is a candidate.

And that in turn means that it is possible that this political cycle, instead of the usual disingenuous disavowals and fights about whether or not clothes are a legitimate part of spin and manipulation and the fight for higher office, we might actually be able to have a meaningful conversation about how exactly our candidates are attempting to communicate through cloth, and what exactly the subtext is.

Trick or treat?

Subject: Multikultistan: A house of horrors for ordinary Germans

Britain is something of the odd man out in immigration-devastated Europe, having also received large numbers of successful non-Western immigrants such as Hindus/Sikhs and Chinese. By sharp contrast, the UK's Muslims, blacks, Roma and other problem immigrant groups do no better than those on the Continent, as I will show with statistics at a later date.

Muslim Immigration and Multicultural Madness have left a trail of misery and mayhem across Germany – with far worse to come because of demographics

Muslims make up only 9% of Berlin's population, yet account for 70% of young repeat criminals, revealed Berlin public prosecutor Roman Reusch http://www.spiegel.de/spiegel/print/d-51448987.html. To be more precise, 46% of Berlin's juvenile serial criminals are of Arab descent, while 33% of them have Turkish ancestry http://www.bz-berlin.de/archiv/jugendkriminalitaet-article961342.html. In an un-German display of harsh-truth telling, Reusch said in Der Spiegel that "in parts [of Berlin], the population consist almost exclusively of problem cases." As he tells it, immigrant children as young as six or seven years old turn to crime and grow up to see honest hard-working people as targets – walking sources of easy money. German society is completely powerless in the face of growing ruthless violence and crime. To describe the German police and criminal-justice system as a big joke would be unfair to big jokes. You won't be surprised to hear that the outspoken public prosecutor has meanwhile been sacked from his job and banned from talking to the media.

The German police admits that large immigrant areas of Berlin, Hamburg, the Ruhr Area, etc. have become police no-go areas, where criminals and extremists have free reign. Within no time at all, a lone police patrol car making a foray into Germany's ethnic war zones finds itself surrounded by a baying lynch mob, much like US soldiers in Baghdad at the height of the troubles, added Roman Reusch.

Check out footage of Berlin's Wedding district, which has become too dangerous for a single police officer to work in, as told by a policeman dressed in civilian clothes for his own safety http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=K4ZLv84i3Gw&feature=related. A ZDF report http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=BBgsqPgEcEk&feature=related explains that rapidly growing immigrant violence against police officers is not confined to Berlin and Hamburg. The Ruhr Area, to mention another example, has also seen the emergence of ghettoized police no-go areas. That is confirmed by a Westen interview http://www.derwesten.de/politik/in-problemvierteln-fuerchtet-sich-sogar-die-polizei-id4926287.html with Bernhard Witthaut, the tightlipped chairman of Germany's largest police union, who knows so much more than he is prepared to let on.

A police spokesman points out Berlin's ever-worsening ultraviolent ghettos on a map http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=2CbXjKCJLAg&feature=player_embedded. In a few decades, he won't need to be so precise and can just wave in the general direction of Berlin. The operative word is demographics – a concept alien to German Leftists, who suffer from a severe case of innumeracy.

Whites are fleeing West Berlin to escape immigrant violence specifically targeting native Germans. So says juvenile court judge Kirsten Heisig in a ZDF report http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=5sCxZZLWeUU&feature=related. Groups of heavily armed young Turks and Arabs routinely beat white youngsters into pulp, especially their faces and teeth, while filming the whole episode for distribution among their mates. The juvenile court judge provides the grisly details http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=1DHJouSioDU&feature=player_embedded.

Anti-white racism of the most virulent kind has become a fact of life across Europe, but perhaps nowhere more so than in Germany. Kirsten Heisig's book When Patience Comes to an End details the visceral hatred many Muslims feel toward native Germans, who are subjected to a daily torrent of abuse and ethnic slurs in their own country. Even young Turkish women think nothing of calling native girls "German whores" and chanting that "Germans should be gassed," she writes. Here young Muslim women shout "So sieht Deutscher Inzest aus" at police officers http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cqeXMFrfVg8&feature=related.

Lone native students at Muslim immigrant-dominated vocational high schools quite often won't last a week and are lucky to escape their bullies physically unhurt. In this footage, four immigrants mug a German man in a Berlin subway station, beating him into a coma and leaving him permanently brain-damaged http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=h33KeFIOk7A . The four perpetrators were teenagers from Albania, Kosovo, Iraq and Nigeria, who had earlier shouted "Scheiß-Nazis" and "wir hassen Deutsche" at the victim and his colleagues. The fact that, in all likelihood, most or all of them are refugees granted asylum by Goody-Goody Germany further adds to the heinous nature of the crime. I can give similar examples until the cows come home, and these are only the ones that somehow slipped past the censors. Clearly, Germany is now well beyond the banana republic phase and has entered the realm of patsydom. Always lurching from one form of extremism to the next, Germans have now decided that the role of an über-schlemiel is a perfect fit. The New CorrectThink is: Deutschland unter alles!

As Green Party Co-Leader Cem Özdemir acknowledges, anti-Semitism is rife and rampant among German Turks and other Muslims. Matters are no better in Turkey itself, if a Dutch English-language article is anything to go by http://www.investigativeproject.org/2075/resurgence-of-anti-semitism-in-turkey. This footage with English subtitles of two anti-Semitic incidents http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=j9nbKp1KJ1Y&feature=related was recorded in the Netherlands, but could just as easily have been filmed anywhere else in Western Europe. Multicultural Europe is ringing to the sound of Judenbeschimpfungen, and we ain't heard nothing yet. Even pre-Toulouse, various in-the-loop sources said that many if not most Jews in Continental Europe were ready to flee to Israel or America at a moment's notice. The German Left always hears echoes of the 1930s and 40s, and they don't know how right they are.

43% of gays in Berlin have experienced hate crimes perpetrated by Muslims in particular, while two thirds of Turkish high school students in Berlin display homophobia http://www.spiegel.de/international/germany/0,1518,562638,00.html. The same picture can be seen in the rest of Multicultural Europe. To quote the Toronto Sun http://www.torontosun.com/comment/columnists/ezra_levant/2010/10/08/15630946.html, "If you think Amsterdam is the gay capital of Europe, you're half-right, but 10 years out of date. Today it's the gay-bashing capital of Europe." Although I can quibble over one or two remarks made in the article, its main thrust is spot on.

Yet another target group for young Muslim males consists of German girls. I am not only referring to the large number of white sex slaves once or still held by German Muslim pimps http://www.zdf.de/ZDFmediathek/beitrag/video/1507644/Mit-Liebe-in-die-Falle-gelockt#/beitrag/video/1507644/Mit-Liebe-in-die-Falle-gelockt (the most conservative estimate for the Netherlands is 6,000), but also German girls and women in general. About 2.5 minutes into this clip http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=BDoOxBppK0U&NR=1&feature=endscreen, Muslim feminist Seyran Ateş explains that young Muslim men use the word Hure as an abusive term for German girls as a matter of course. Another favorite is Deutsche Schlampe.

Unlike the Multikultis, the German working class cannot block out or distort awful reality and needs to live in the real world. For example, I have a hunch that there are precious few Multikulti converts to be found among German bus drivers http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=21PUr8NBjBo&feature=related. In another clip, a German bus company spokesman explains that even immigrant pensioners beat up bus drivers. Let me also show you images of a 78-year-old German female shopkeeper hit 50 times in her face by a 14-year-old Bosnian http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=crWXxpjEbNg&list=UU6G0I-JHFGh94Sr7GRji3Ew&index=2&feature=plcp. The young robber belongs to a family granted asylum by Germany. Heart-warming, don't you think?

Der Spiegel http://www.spiegel.de/international/germany/0,1518,654921,00.html reports that a staggering 50% of Berlin's Turks live on the dole. But if you include stay-at-home Turkish women living indirectly off benefits, the unemployment figure rises to about 70%! Everything I've read about Berlin's Arabs suggests to me that subsidized slothfulness among them is even worse. A humorous sign in America's Rocky Mountain National Park sums up what is wrong with Welfarized Europe, "Please do not feed the squirrels. If you feed the squirrels, they'll become overweight, and prone to disease. Their population will grow, and they'll lose their ability to forage for food on their own. They will expect you to feed them and will attack you if you don't. They'll become like little welfare recipients, and you wouldn't want to do this to them."

A mind-mashing 63% of preschool immigrant children (often 4th generation!) in Berlin's Kreuzberg district speak little or no German and are theoretically inadmissible to an elementary school, reveals Professor of Pedagogy Ali Ucar in Time magazine. That's what Muslim parents call "giving your child a head start in life." The wider problem is that these kids bring along zilch educational and character-building baggage, courtesy of can't-be-bothered parents. The poverty of aspiration among welfarized Muslim immigrants is a far greater impediment to progress than the poverty of wealth experienced by newcomers in the distant past.

At one Berlin vocational high school visited by Spiegel TV Magazin reporters http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=sagPdsof1Hc&feature=player_embedded, up to 50% of immigrant students in some classes are unteachable, which may well be representative for Berlin. Not that the rest is Nobel Prize material, to use the understatement of the past millennium. It's worth your while to view the whole report, which will leave even the most jaded observers shocked and depressed. Ordinary Germans will pick up the tab in the form of astronomic welfare costs and an extremely violent crime wave.

Young Turkish criminals have a vocabulary of 500 German words largely devoid of any grammar. As a matter of fact, Time writes that most third-generation Turks speak insufficient German (read: Mickey Mouse German) and that almost three-quarters of German Turks live in Turkish-speaking enclaves. You will be straining to follow any of the Turks in the featured clips, whose German is so dreadful as to be almost comical.

The language skills of Arab criminals (in Germany, Arab is catchall tag for anyone from that region) do not seem to be any better than those of Turkish street goons. Here you've got a young Arab street thug in a TV studio http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qy9HCYs1V14 telling a German audience that he routinely beats up Germans for money and for "giving him a wrong look." However, his Street German is so bad that even Germans can hardly make out what he is saying. He could well be a member of the untouchable Kurdish-Lebanese 2,600-member Miri clan – one of many Arab clans and extended families who plunder and terrorize Germany with total impunity. The PC-straightjacketed German police strikes me as being no more effective than the two bungling detectives in The Adventures of Tintin.

The cataclysmic language situation among Deutschtürken does not stop Recep Tayyip Erdogan, the Prime Minister of Greater Turkey, from making the beyond-bizarre demand that German Turks learn Turkish as a first language and continue speaking Turkish in a foreign land. Pushing the envelope like a bulldozer, he is now even clamoring for Turkish-only high schools in Germany. Well, why not? He is already in full control of all Turkish mosques in Germany and might just as well go the whole hog. During a 2001 speech before German Turks in the city of Düsseldorf, he even had the gall to tell them, "You're my citizens!" When will Germany, which is beginning to look like a Turkish colony, come to its senses?

With a rapidly graying population of 82 million, Germany is now playing host to 5 million Muslims. They divide into 4 million Turks (including 400,000 Turkish Kurds), 500,000 Arabs (a label used for just about anyone from that part of the world), 300,000 Ethnic Albanians (originate in Albania, Kosovo and the Republic of Macedonia) and smaller groups. That figure of 4 million Turks – which includes second-, third- and fourth-generation Turks – comes from Wikipedia, The Globe and Mail and other sources. Not factored in are the large numbers of illegal Turkish immigrants living in Little Istanbuls across Germany and working in the black-market economy.

Predictably, I could not readily find reliable info on the future ethnic face of Germany. So for demographic clues, let's look at France, which is home to 62 million people, including 6 million Muslims. A Jerusalem Post article http://www.jpost.com/Opinion/Columnists/Article.aspx?

id=170731 and other sources expect France's Muslim community to be the majority within 50 years. "If the low birth rate of indigenous French citizens and the prolific demographic expansion of the existing 6 million Muslims continue," writes the newspaper, "there is every likelihood that in 50 years France would become a predominantly Muslim nation." In actual fact, The Jerusalem Post is being wildly overoptimistic, having completely overlooked a game-changing event: Turkey's probable entry into the EU, which is the herd of pink elephants in the immigration debate.

Locally and regionally, Muslim dominance will make itself felt much sooner in Europe. For example, overwhelmingly Muslim immigrants already account for about half of the population in the Netherlands' four biggest cities, even forming a small majority in Amsterdam. An even more striking example is Brussels, Europe's Capital. Predominantly Muslim non-Western immigrants represent 70% of the Brussels population and will reach 85% within a decade, according to sociologist Jan Hertogen, whose delight at this development knows no bounds. To put it vividly, Brussels has turned into one Big Banlieue, except for the EU & NATO Gravy Train, whose official religion of PCness could not contrast more sharply with dire reality across Western Europe. Belgium's second-largest city, Antwerp, will have a majority-immigrant population within less than a decade, while other major Belgian cities are not that far behind.

A Turk with a sense of humor or realism has marked out future "Turkish Europe" on a map http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cSb6BNRly5Q&feature=related . Actually, he is being modest! Indulging in a bit of wild-eyed speculation, I suspect that Turkey's PM envisages the creation a "Greater Turkey sphere of influence" along the lines of what is shown 40 seconds into this clip http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=2_Dzq_mKhok&feature=fvwrel . Among so much else, this includes the Great Seljuq Empire, the Ottoman Empire, the Mogul Empire, all regions speaking a Turkic language (200 million people have a Turkic language as their native or second tongue), the whole Muslim world, plus rapidly growing "Satellite Dish Europe," which may well double in number or much more on Turkey's likely admission into the EU. Once the influx of Turks picks up momentum, the whole of Western Europe will frantically wave them on in the direction of Germany, shouting at the top of their lungs, "Deutschland gut, Deutschland multikulti!"

While women's shelters are overflowing with terrified immigrant women, nutty-as-a-fruitcake German judges tell abused Muslim women that their inhumane treatment at the hands of their menfolk is all in the game for Muslim females. "In Germany today," The Independent http://www.independent.co.uk/opinion/commentators/johann-hari/johann-hari-how-multiculturalism-is-betraying-women-446806.html writes, "Muslim women have been reduced to third-class citizens stripped of core legal protections – because of the doctrine of Multiculturalism, which says a society should be divided into separate cultures with different norms according to ethnic origin." Also bear in mind that most abused Muslim women are too terrified to ask for outside help in the first place and for good reason. Germany, too, has seen its fair share of reported honor attacks, which probably only form the top of the tip of the iceberg. It is much more difficult but not impossible to hide honor murders. Given the shocking attitudes of young German Muslims toward honor crimes http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=JaBj0SSmXvo&feature=related , Germany must brace itself for much more of the same.

The German Multikulti Terror State is an extremely dangerous place for the Politically Incorrect. To mention just four immigration critics, Kirsten Heisig killed herself; Seyran Ateş went into hiding after an attack in which no one lifted a finger to help her; Thilo Sarrazin will require body guards for the rest of his life; while Roman Reusch has been demoted and media-muzzled. In the blink of an eye, I could Google together half a dozen prominent activists who have suffered similar fates. On top of that, thousands of second-tier dissidents have probably been ostracized and harassed out of existence. Hey, who needs the Stasi, when you've got the Multikultis?!

Perhaps mentally exhausted from her lone uphill battle against the Mighty Multikulti Mafia, juvenile court judge Kirsten Heisig committed suicide in 2010. What will not have helped matters were the growing number of unbearably grisly cases she was facing on a daily basis, as well as the death threats and unimaginable invective directed at anyone foolish enough to speak out on the Immigration Disaster. This clip http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=VOQda5kOTUo displays an English-language text saying that many believe that the judge was murdered and goes on to show German news footage of her with English subtitles. Her book When Patience Comes to an End became a No. 1 bestseller in Germany and will spawn a movie.

At the same time, ghastly tidings from the rest of Western Europe keep coming in thick and fast. A tiny selection from my bulging mailbag: 100,000 girls and women mutilated by FGM practitioners in the UK; an immigrant rape epidemic in Scandinavia; four Jews and three soldiers murdered in France; predominantly black gangs have parceled up and terrorize London; Pakistani lover boys ply their awful trade in Britain almost without let or hindrance; plus public-transportation workers, hospital staff, ambulance employees, firemen and police officers across the Continent suffer from unbelievable levels of violence, threats and verbal abuse from immigrants, with some of the most appalling scenes witnessed in Sweden, rated as having the worst immigration record in the whole of Western Europe by Elsevier magazine.

Almost all Turks in Germany and Turkey are in complete denial about Deutschtürken's atrocious behavior across the board and even bask in utterly risible victimhood. What strikes me the most about a Turkish culture so obsessed with "honor" is the total absence of any shame over bringing so much hatred, aggression, crime, misery, urban decay, welfare costs and dysfunctionality in all areas of life to Germany and other European host countries. In a brief window of opportunity – which was slammed shut in the wake of the media coverage surrounding the Far-Right Murders – German public television made a few halfhearted attempts to debate catastrophic immigration in Germany. If I heard this correctly while listening with half an ear, at the beginning of one program, a Turkish interviewee unblinkingly described immigration in Germany as "ein Erfolgsmodel" (a success model), without eliciting roars of Homeric laughter from the studio audience. I could almost hear the WDR journalist thinking, "Oh my God, we've got a live one here," before he went into full career-protection mode and managed his best bullshit smile ever. One of the few exceptions in the Turkish community is feminist-social scientist Necla Kelek, who has defended Thilo Sarrazin, the bête noire of German politics, explaining that he addresses "bitter truths" in his much-talked-about book.

The Multikulti Mullahs still have Germany in a chokehold, but for how much longer?

Multiculturalism – the human variant of mad cow disease – seems to have run its course in much of Europe, but is still going strong in Germany. Tune into German television or visit German news websites, and it's like going back in time to much darker days. Most (but definitely not all!) German media coverage of Turkish and other Muslim immigrants is just one big blur of Multikulti twaddle. In fact, the reporting is so delightfully deceitful that it becomes entertaining in a demented freaky sort of way. In strident denial of staring-them-in-the-face immigration calamities, the vast majority of German journalists continue to preach the multicultural gospel with all the religious fervor of snake-oil televangelists, threatening the growing number of apostates with fire and brimstone.

For example, the Hezbollah faction within the ZDF sees the subject of Deutschenhaß (hatred of Germans) as one big joke and uses its well-honed rapier wit to maximum effect http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=5MLzDMtmxmQ&feature=related. The phrase cringe television does not even begin to do justice to Germany's Multikulti TV. Even worse than many journalists are German Leftwing politicians, who are to lying what Holland is to cheese. Baron Münchhausen cannot hold a candle to, say, SPD and Green politicians waxing lyrical about immigration and rejecting the crushing facts of life with deadpan delivery. To quote Canada's Globe and Mail newspaper http://m.theglobeandmail.com/commentary/angela-merkel-says-the-unsayable-on-multikulti/article1381180/?service=mobile, "Like Canadians, Germans have been swamped by official propaganda celebrating the joys of ethnic diversity. In both countries, expressing doubts over immigration policy has been socially verboten."

Although Germany is now surrounded by smaller nations that are beginning to see the light (the Netherlands, Flanders, Denmark, Switzerland and Austria), Germany remains trapped in the PC Dark Ages. Why is this so? Under Hitler's looming shadow – which obliterates any well-informed and rational discussion of snowballing immigration problems – German Polite Society has long had an easy task of ruthlessly imposing its particular brand of PC Nastiness on the German masses. The frequent invocation of Hitler still serves as a nuclear weapon in the immigration debate, as infantile as that may sound to more mature and developed nations. German society is like a dog that has never outgrown its puppy phase, and the Left is hell-bent to keep it that way. Say anything deviating one syllable from Loopy Lefty orthodoxy, and you are accused of being a Nazi (quite often by folks with strong Leftwing Nazi credentials), put your career at risk, face ostracization and become an easy target for violence and intimidation from Muslim Supremacists and Black Blockers. The German national character also comes into play. Most Germans are docile, group-oriented and fearful of authority to a degree that their naturally rebellious and big-mouthed Dutch neighbors – the New Yorkers of Europe, if you will – would find side-splittingly hilarious.

But as Johan Cruyff famously observed, "Every disadvantage has its advantage." The rapidly escalating immigration mess created by Germany's Multikulti-Narren has now become so horrendous that reality can no longer be hidden from view. Quite a few über-shocking media reports had slipped past the PC censors, before the Far-Right Murders put a halt to that blast of glasnost. In three years' time, a select group of German journalists with balls and brains will probably pick up where they left off and will once again tell the unvarnished truth on immigration. Equally important, more than half of Germans are now in revolt against the Leftwing Establishment, and their number will only increase in the face of the demographics-driven banlieue-ization of their country. Germany has also produced a dozen immigration critics of note, including those mentioned in my previous email. Even Angela Merkel, normally as cautious as a snail braking hard for a curve in the road, felt compelled to talk to the nation like a Dutch uncle http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=UKG76HF24_k . What is further working against the Multikultis' still-iron grip on power is that Germany is becoming the odd man out in its own neck of the woods. Thankfully, the sort of PC Wackoism that is pretty much prevalent among Germany's Ruling Classes is getting rarer by the day in Western Europe and is being steadily pushed out to the fringes of Western Europe (Britain and Sweden/Norway).

The demasqué of the Multikulti Horror State is complete, but that news has not yet reached the German powers that be Polish-born Henryk Broder is well aware that neighboring countries – left reeling from their own immigration experience – are beginning to regard Germany as la risée de l'Europe. In a TV appearance http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=wkvlT2dLSMs&feature=related , Broder makes a scathing assessment of German Polite Society, which is incapable of accepting even the most basic home truths and having a productive public debate about an issue that, because of unrelenting demographics, will loom ever larger in Germany. The enfant terrible of German journalism takes the whole Multicultural Cabal to task and cuts through all the crap: Almost all immigrant problems in Germany are Muslim-connected. No number of red herrings fished up by the multi-billion Diversity Industry will ever change that Mother of All Facts. And no amount of starry-eyed rhetoric on the part of Green Party Co-Leader Cem Özdemir, who locks horns with Broder in the TV program, will ever make the slightest bit of difference. You might just as well try to wish gravity away.

Tragically, the immigration situation is so much worse than even Broder thinks in his lily-white innocence. Just take a load of the litany of human disasters in Germany detailed above. Alternatively, examine the state of affairs in equally blighted neighboring countries. Let me quote a few facts and figures from the Netherlands – the only country in the world where oft-devastating immigration statistics are fairly freely available. Shockingly, 55% of all young Moroccan males in the Netherlands have been the subject of a police investigation http://www.nieuwsblad.be/article/detail.aspx?articleid=GIE2B2Q4K. Indeed, the unofficial, yet reliable figure for Amsterdam is 70%! As if all of that weren't deeply troubling enough, psychologist Indra Boedjarath http://www.trouw.nl/tr/nl/4324/nieuws/article/detail/1394009/2007/10/27/Dubbelleven-Marokkanen-fnuikt-psyche.dhtml explains that many Moroccan youngsters suffer from psychological problems, adding that numerous Moroccan criminals are "slightly mentally handicapped." On and on it goes.

Although I have only built up a very rough impression of the Dutch equivalent of the BBC's Crimewatch program (cannot bear to watch it for more than a few seconds at a time), the common thread running through all episodes seems to be that almost all of the thugs are non-Western immigrants and that almost all the victims are whites. The victims are often on the bottom rungs of society – from supermarket staff to frail senior citizens, who have been intimidated, humiliated, robbed, beaten silly or stabbed with blood-curdling brutality in their own country. The crime-program makers have even developed their own PC language to identify the never-ending immigrant rogues' gallery paraded on Dutch TV screens, week after deeply depressing week. Moroccan suspects have a "North African appearance," while blacks have a "negroid appearance." Not that long ago, one Dutch black comedian joked that he watched this crime show to see what his mates had been up to, but few Dutch people were laughing.

The newly published book The Immigration Taboo by Joost Niemöller discloses that 50% of the Netherlands' non-Western immigrants are unemployed, adding that this percentage is seven times worse than that among natives. Presumably, he confines himself to those actually drawing unemployment benefits. Throw in the little-discussed fact that almost all immigrant women in the Netherlands are unemployable according to the NRC newspaper, and real unemployment (all working-age people without jobs) among immigrants in Holland may well come out at 70% or thereabouts. Could it even be worse? Has Niemöller also counted all those immigrants who are jobless, yet have been falsely declared "disabled"? Bear in mind that the tiny Netherlands holds the per-capita world record for the number of people on various forms of "disability" benefits, aka the Scam of the Century, namely 715,000. Everything I write needs to be carefully fact-checked; I've worked with great haste not only due to time restraints, but also because I find non-Western immigration an excruciatingly depressing subject.

More broadly speaking, there is not even a single Western European country with a successful Muslim community, as I've shown with granite-hard facts and figures and will further substantiate with more of the same. Instead, in only slightly varying degrees, Muslim immigration is just one long tale of woe and misery for the long-suffering host countries, which are in for far worse to come in the decades ahead because of barely understood demographic realities. Incidentally, the same sad observation can be made of the Black Diaspora in Western Europe, North America, Latin America and the Caribbean (see previous statistics-packed emails and upcoming info – you have yet to receive these!).

Germany's Immigration Disaster Deniers have as much credibility as alien abductees spirited away in a UFO with Bigfoot at the controls

Immigration Disaster Denial has deep roots in German society and goes way beyond the usual suspects – aging Communists in their last hurrah (so left-over '60s rabble and relics of the GDR dictatorship). Almost as fanatic and myopic are the folks called das liberale Bildungsbürgertum, to use Roman Reusch's caustic epithet for Germany's Class of Educated Ignoramuses, who live in a whites-only cocooned fantasy world and indulge in Gutmenscherei at the expense of the vulnerable in society, slandered as "racists" when they have the chutzpah to complain about their awful lot. Suffer in silence, will you, and let us dream on! For example, I was aghast to learn that the flat-earthist book The Scaremongers: The German Fear of Islam had been penned by a journalist in the employ of the Frankfurter Allgemeine and not some fringe Trot rag. Who would have thought? It's almost as if Germany's Babbling Classes wish to make up for their lack of humor and humanity with nonstop misguided moralizing and grotesque grandstanding. In my experience, those who holler the loudest about morality possess the least amount of it.

History will render a devastating verdict on the FAZ journalist and all other flat earthers, lampooning the PC Era as a period of moral and mind meltdown of the sort Europe has seen so often in recent times. However, that is cold comfort to the many long-suffering victim groups described in my messages, including white elderly people who are imprisoned in their own homes in ethnic hellholes and are forced to live out their final days amid horrific levels of vandalism, theft, vitriolic threats and violence from even very young immigrant children, backed up by bigger siblings and parents, as I heard in distressing accounts. I also witnessed some of these blood-boiling scenes in South Rotterdam. The very least that white senior citizens across the multiculturally afflicted parts of Western Europe can expect is name-calling and intimidation, as exemplified by footage with English subtitles http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=bYqzy-QrQZM&feature=related of a white elderly woman in a city train in Copenhagen who is being bullied by a North African man (probably a Moroccan). One highly unusual comment to the Danish train clip reads, "My Muslim brothers are such pigs, I understand why everyone hates them."

In various interviews, ex-public prosecutor Roman Reusch reserved special scorn for Germany's Clueless Cultural Classes, who sit pretty in their affluent whites-only enclaves far removed from all the ethnic misery and engage in exalted Multikulti-Moralreiterei to the severe detriment of the working hoi polloi. He sharply contrasts the Multikultis' lofty position in society with that of a lowly sales assistant who has already been robbed three times by hordes of armed immigrants and needs to pop tranquilizers every morning, so that she can get through another day in the multicultural war zone http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Aqc7mxcfJbI&feature=related . In the words of German journalist Sabine Beppler-Spahl, "Being 'pro-immigration' and 'pro-multiculturalism' in Germany today is like a lifestyle choice, a way of proving that you are culturally refined and cosmopolitan, unlike the supposedly uncultured, racist working classes." Every German pays a hefty price for botched immigration through higher taxes, but it is bottom-of-the-heap whites in the "war trenches of society," who figuratively and literally bleed for the ignorance, idiocy and callousness of the Yapping Classes. Sadly, the working class is only one of various segments of German society increasingly hurting and suffering at the hands of Muslim immigrants. Other hard-hit victim groups include Jews, gays, the old and frail, plus native young people. And matters are set to get so much worse for them, owing to dramatic demographics, including Turkey's likely admission into the EU.

The info contained in my emails shatters this cozy image of a Multicultural Utopia, long flogged by Germany's Diversity Mongers. In one or two follow-ups, I'll be presenting more details on the issues raised here plus new material. In examining German immigration, you need to make a sharp distinction between the country's Muslims (Turks, Arabs, etc.) and its non-Muslim immigrants (Poles, Greeks, Italians, Vietnamese, etc.). By and large, the second group appears to be faring well. As part of a thick smokescreen created around the Muslim Immigration Debacle, the German Left likes to lump all immigrants together.

My Internet Blitz across Germany confirmed my very worst fears. All my writings require thorough checking, investigation and consideration, though. Truth be told, I am no expert on Germany at all and only follow developments there with a hundredth of an eye and ear, if that. There must have been a point in my life when I simply gave up on a country whose Yapping Classes appear to have all the acuity of mind seen in a special-needs schoolyard and all the moral courage found in a weasel farm. To paraphrase that old JFK quip, when I digitally rampaged through Germany, the thing that surprised me the most was that matters were as God-awful as I'd been saying they were.

Candidates Hone Messages in Convention Run-Up (WSJ 8/19/08)
By AMY CHOZICK AND ELIZABETH HOLMES
Playing to perceived strengths as the conventions loom, John McCain polished his military credentials before an audience of veterans, while Barack Obama empathized with the economic cares of female supporters.

McCain, Obama Duel on Russia (WSJ 8/19/08)
By Gerald F. Seib
In the wake of Russia's march into Georgia, ...Discussions with top foreign-policy advisers to both candidates suggest that the more intriguing question is what the two candidates would have done before the Russians moved. Whose approach toward Russia -- indeed, toward diplomacy in general -- might have prevented the Georgia move in the first place?

If I Were the Boss . . . (Washington Post 8/19/08)
By Joe Davidson; D01
Like other federal workers not content with their current jobs, Sens. John McCain and Barack Obama seek a higher government position with better pay, a bigger office and more responsibility. A major part of that responsibility is being the boss of the federal workplace and its employees. To get an idea of what kind of boss they would be as president, we asked for their views on a series of issues.

McCain's 'Judeo-Christian values' reference puzzles (Boston Globe 8/19/08)
By Peter S. Canellos
On a frozen winter evening at a Town Hall meeting in a school in the Manchester, N.H., suburbs, John McCain expressed surprise and irritation with an intelligence report downplaying the threat of Iran's nuclear program. At the end of a long list of reasons to be suspicious of the Iranians, McCain declared: "And they sure don't share our Judeo-Christian values." It seemed at the time to be an odd thing to say about a Muslim country.

Candidates Soft On Medicare On The Trail (NPR 8/19/08)
by Julie Rovner

Senator John McCain will tell you outright: "I am a Teddy Roosevelt Republican." That's about as elastic as the facts can get. In June, Mr. McCain ("We're gonna drill here! Anti-Regulation Aide to Cheney Is Up for Energy Post (Washington Post 8/19/08)
By Juliet Eilperin; A02
A senior aide to Vice President Cheney is the leading contender to become a top official at the Energy Department, according to several current and former administration officials, a promotion that would put one of the administration's most ardent opponents of environmental regulation in charge of forming department policies on climate change.

Hello All – Two quick things.

1) As you may have seen, ABC News reporting that Speaker Boehner and Republicans in Congress are pledging more investigation into Secretary Clinton on emails. Below are the key points we're sharing with Hill allies and TV surrogates this afternoon to get ahead of it and frame it as crazy GOP investigations AND GOP hypocrisy. We're trying to push folks to go after them.

2) Everyone asked on our last Comm call for more offense against GOP. While we can't do it perfectly before campaign is launched, we've had some success working with partners getting stories on Jeb and others. Clips attached.

Thanks. We'll try to keep these Earned Media Updates as often as we can.

POINTS

While it was permitted for Secretary Clinton to use one blackberry instead of two, looking back she's said it would have been better for her to use two. At the time, this just didn't seem like an issue. She's asked State Department to publicly release all of roughly the 55,000 printed pages of emails she provided them.

Secretary Clinton was the first and only former Secretary to respond to the Department's request last year, and was the only one to provide her work emails.

Secretary Clinton has asked the Department to make her work related emails publicly available, and just like every other Cabinet Secretary and U.S. government official, she gets to choose to keep her personal emails private.

Charlie Cook wrote that: "This is the classic kind of inside-the-Beltway, process story that politicos and reporters get in a lather over, but that resonates very little with average voters."

This isn't about emails, it's about Trey Gowdy furthering a partisan witch-hunt and Republicans in Congress distracting from their dangerous letter to the Iranian regime. There have been nine different Congressional committees that have held hearings on Benghazi . Secretary Clinton spent more than five hours testifying before the Senate and the House of Representatives and participated in briefings for Members.

Gowdy has been criticized for subpoenaing the State Department for emails already turned over to the Select Committee.

Gowdy and Republican have been caught numerous times trying to use the Benghazi investigation to fire up their base and raise money.

Republican Hypocrisy on Emails. They want to hold former Secretary Clinton to a different standard than they'd hold themselves.

Washington Post blog: Plum Line: "Morning Plum: Obama, unbound, puts his stamp on 2016"

By Greg Sargent

December 18, 2014, 9:22 a.m. EST

For years, progressives have sharply criticized President Obama for shaping major decisions around the idea that scaling back his ambitions would ultimately secure the GOP cooperation he had long sought. But the GOP takeover of Congress has effectively freed Obama from that illusion, leaving him little choice other than to be as aggressive and ambitious as possible in unilaterally pursuing his agenda wherever he can.

This is now setting in motion a series of arguments that will shape the next race for the presidency.

In a very good piece, the New York Times' Michael Shear reports that Obama's decision to pursue normalized relations with Cuba is only the latest in a pattern that may characterize his last two years in office:

"The announcement…follows similar decisions by Mr. Obama in recent weeks to defy Republicans on immigration, climate change policy, the regulation of the Internet and negotiations with Iran…

"Mr. Obama's unilateral action on Cuba is part of a pattern that will define the end of his presidency. Frustrated by congressional inaction and Republican efforts to block legislation, the president has increasingly pushed the limits of his executive authority in domestic and international policy making — an approach that anticipates, and largely dismisses, angry responses from his critics…

"Mr. Obama is returning to the original case he made as a presidential candidate, casting himself as a transformational leader who is eager to discard old conventions of politics and policy in ways that appeal to the sensibilities of younger people. Although the midterm elections last month were a victory for Republicans, who took control of the Senate and added to their House majority, the results seem to have only accelerated the president's use of regulatory, diplomatic and executive authority."

Republicans like to say all of this unilateral action defies the will of the people as expressed in the last election. If that is so, then Republicans will surely be glad to hear that much of what Obama is setting in motion may be litigated in another electoral contest — the 2016 presidential race.

When you step back and look at the degree to which these actions are beginning to frame that contest, it's striking. Hillary Clinton has now endorsed Obama's move on Cuba. GOP presidential hopefuls are lining up against it. She has vowed to protect Obama's actions on climate "at all costs," a stance that could take on added significance if a global climate treaty is negotiated next year. Potential GOP presidential candidates will likely vow to undo those actions and line up against U.S. participation in such a treaty.

Clinton has come out in support of Obama's action to shield millions from deportation. GOP presidential hopefuls have lined up against it, effectively reaffirming the party's commitment to deporting as many low-level offenders and longtime residents as possible. And so on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As Shear's piece notes, all these actions appear geared to "the sensibilities of younger people." But it goes beyond this. They are geared to the priorities of many of the voter groups that are increasingly key to Democratic victories in national elections: millennials, nonwhite voters, and college educated whites, especially women. The Cuba shift may appeal to young voters, particularly younger Cubans in the key swing state of Florida. The move on deportations could sharpen the contrast between the parties in ways that enhance the Democratic advantage among Latinos. The moves on climate could appeal to millennials and socially liberal upscale whites.

The common thread uniting all of these is a Democratic gamble that such groups will be swayed by an agenda that is forward-looking and more accepting of evolving demographic, international and scientific realities, and will see the GOP as increasingly trapped in the past.

One big unknown is whether the next Democratic nominee can get out the Obama coalition in the numbers he did. But it increasingly looks like a good deal more of the Obama agenda than expected — in the form of all these unilateral actions — may be on the ballot in 2016 to appeal to these voter groups. Republicans delighted in arguing that Obama's policies were soundly rejected in the last election. But we're now playing on a presidential year field, and Obama's new approach appears to be only getting started.

New York Times Magazine: "Can Liberal Zionists Count On Hillary Clinton?"

By Jason Horowitz

Daniel Zemel first visited Israel fresh off his bar mitzvah, in 1966. A bookish Jewish kid from Chicago, Zemel had a love for Israel inherited from his grandfather, Rabbi Solomon Goldman, a friend of Albert Einstein's who was president from 1938 to 1940 of the then left-leaning Zionist Organization of America. With the other members of his Jewish education group, the 13-year-old Zemel spent two weeks in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Haifa. He lunched in cafeterias with the kibbutzniks he idolized, ate frozen treats on the beach and climbed a lookout tower, peering into Jerusalem's still forbidden Old City. A year later, Zemel was ecstatic when Israeli forces captured everything he had surveyed and beyond, including the Temple Mount, the West Bank and Gaza, in the Six-Day War with Egypt, Syria and Jordan. Over the decades, as Israel matured and began to wrestle with the occupation, Zemel did, too. He visited Israel again and again, as a college student, a rabbinical student and an assistant rabbi in Minnesota.

In 1983, Zemel became the head rabbi of Temple Micah, in the Northwest section of Washington. In the constellation of liberal American synagogues, there are a handful that stand out for their political engagement and the influence of their members — Leo Baeck Temple in Los Angeles, Congregation Beth Elohim in Park Slope, Brooklyn, and KAM Isaiah Israel on Barack Obama's old block in Chicago. But none have more connections to Capitol Hill.

In the fall, Zemel, a contemplative 62-year-old with horn-rimmed glasses, a bushy mustache and a bald dome from which his skullcap incessantly slips, stood before his congregation in a state of unrest. It was the start of the Jewish New Year, and he had decided to express his anguish over Israel in the form of a sermon about the direction his beloved country had taken. All summer, during the war in Gaza, Zemel and many of the members of his progressive congregation had been racked with worry. In his book-lined office, decorated with an Israeli flag and a poster of Yoda holding a Hebrew bible, emails from congregants had been regularly popping up on Zemel's computer screen, railing about Israelis "killing children." Zemel sat with congregants as they wept on his couch.

The entire year 5774, in fact, was a trying one for Zemel and other liberal Zionists, who increasingly find themselves torn between their liberalism and Zionism and stranded in the disappearing middle between the extremes of a polarized American Jewish community. Micah's liberal Zionists remained wedded to a two-state solution for Israelis and Palestinians and estranged from the policies of a right-wing Israeli government, along with the reflexively Israel-can-do-no-wrong sentiment on Capitol Hill. But they also felt alienated by Jewish groups to their left, some of which chanted, "Stop the murder, stop the hate, Israel is a racist state."

Zemel, fighting a nagging cold, looked out at the robust crowd on Rosh Hashana. He knew that the people gathered before him — and the people they knew — could help determine United States policy toward Israel. Some of them even had a direct line to Hillary Clinton, the early favorite to be the Democrats' nominee for president in 2016. Sara Ehrman, who is 95 and a veteran of Jewish-American politics, was a mentor to Clinton; she sat next to Maria Echaveste, a former official in Bill Clinton's administration and a convert to Judaism whom President Obama nominated to become ambassador to Mexico. Al From, an architect of the Democratic resurgence of the 1990s and adviser to Bill Clinton, sat across the aisle. Arrayed around them sat newspaper, magazine and television journalists in a congregation that included David Gregory, a former host of "Meet the Press"; Jake Tapper, a CNN anchor; and Dana Bash, a Washington correspondent for CNN and the former wife of Jeremy Bash, who was a national-security official in the Obama administration. Another member of the congregation is Alan Cooperman, director of religion research at the Pew Research Center, which a year before published a landmark portrait of Jewish Americans that showed, among other things, that less than a third of young Jews said "caring about Israel" was essential to their Jewish identity.

Zemel adjusted his skullcap. "Tonight we celebrate the creation of the world," he said. "But in this season we also take a look at ourselves: We acknowledge our past, our errors, who we are. What better time to look in the same way at the only Jewish country in the world? The events of this summer actually only strengthened my decision to speak about Israel and American Jewry's ongoing and evolving relationship with that mystifying, infuriating yet enchanting place."

As the sermon progressed, Zemel became more impassioned. He recounted the story of the reprisal murder in July of a Palestinian teenager from East Jerusalem by Israeli extremists. "I am so ashamed," he shouted. He bemoaned the growing ultranationalism in Israel by saying it had "dragged through the mud" what he called "the greatest ethical tradition in history." Heads nodded in the pews. "In many segments of American Jewry," Zemel said, "one is free to disagree with the president of the United States, but the prime minister of Israel is sacrosanct. How patently absurd!" Zemel's criticism of the current Israeli government pivoted to a discussion of how the Holocaust and that summer's flare-ups of anti-Semitism in Europe reminded them all that Israel was existentially necessary. "We must love Israel even harder," he concluded, quoting from the Israeli national anthem. "Od lo avda tikvateinu. We have not yet lost our hope."

For Zemel and his faithfully Democratic congregation, that hope and anxiety has come to rest most squarely on Hillary Clinton. This has happened at the same time that Clinton has staked out a firmly hawkish, pro-Israel position on Gaza and Israeli security. In August, many liberals were discouraged after reading a Clinton interview with Jeffrey Goldberg of The Atlantic. In it, she struck a tone on Israel that was markedly more hard-line than that of the Obama administration, generally avoiding empathy with Palestinian losses and asserting, "If I were the prime minister of Israel, you're damn right I would expect to have control over security" on the West Bank.

Asked about her tough talk, liberal Zionists tend to blame the requirements of American presidential-campaign politics. A vast majority of Jews care far more about social issues and the economy than they do about the issue of Israel and will always vote for the Democratic candidate. "Democrats who are Jewish will turn out in droves in support of her," Haim Saban, a media mogul and major Clinton-campaign financier told me. And the Jewish donors? "Without a doubt."

But Clinton knows that there is a wealthy and influential sliver of more-moderate Democratic Jews for whom Israel is a priority. They are less conservative than the G.O.P.'s top Jewish donors, like Sheldon Adelson, the billionaire casino owner, but feel protective enough of Israel that they could plausibly support a Republican if they sensed anything less than complete support from a Democrat. The political arithmetic for Clinton is easy — knowing you can take the larger liberal Jewish vote for granted, you support Israel's right-wing government to keep moderates from bolting.

The political quandary for liberal Zionists is that, as part of the Jewish majority that will vote for Clinton regardless, they aren't in a great position to make demands and are reduced to hoping that Clinton secretly agonizes over the issue as much as they do. Saban, the major Clinton-campaign financier, told me that Clinton was pained by the consequences of Israel's actions, just not publicly. "I can tell you that privately she has expressed empathy for the Palestinians," he told me. "She has." Victor Kovner, a Democratic bundler who has a Chuck Close painting of Hillary Clinton hanging in his New York office, assures fellow liberal Jews that Clinton is on their side. "She is running for president, this isn't true-self time," he said. He suggested that Bill Clinton had demonstrated a much more nuanced view.

But other Clinton supporters have no patience for hand-wringing liberal Zionists, especially because there is little daylight between them and Clinton on actual policy. "What do they want her to do?" said Ann Lewis, a senior adviser on Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign who is involved with Jewish issues.

The standard line for Hillary Clinton, who declined to be interviewed for this article, is that she has been a consistent voice for Israel and for peace over the last quarter-century. But other Clinton intimates, including those in Temple Micah, say they have watched her position shift by degrees over the decades. Ehrman, for one, recalled an early iteration of Hillary Clinton as a promising liberal voice on Israel. Ehrman first met Clinton during George McGovern's 1972 presidential campaign in Texas. Back in Washington, Ehrman hosted Clinton, who had landed a job on the Watergate committee, in her apartment for a year, and the two became close. Ehrman later drove Clinton to Fayetteville, Ark., telling her all the way that she was making a mistake by giving up a promising career to marry the "country lawyer" Bill Clinton.

In the early 1980s, Ehrman became political-education director of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee — or Aipac — the country's most potent pro-Israel lobbying group. When the Clintons came to Washington as president and first lady, Ehrman became deputy political director of the Democratic National Committee. "I did all the Jewish stuff around the White House," Ehrman said. That work culminated in organizing the Oslo Accords ceremony, at which Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin shook hands with the Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat on the south lawn of the White House, sealing an agreement between Jews and Palestinians to end their conflict. On the morning of the signing ceremony, Hillary Clinton called Ehrman with a special reward. "'I want you to stand at the front door of the diplomatic entrance, the main entrance, and I want you to see them coming in,'" Ehrman recalled her saying.

The event was a high point of liberal Zionism's harmony with Washington politics. "It was totally, totally amazing," said Zemel, who also attended the event. Clinton's interest in the issue did not end there. In May 1998, speaking via satellite to young Arabs and Israelis gathered in Switzerland for a conference, she became one of the first people associated with the Clinton administration to call for a two-state solution. "I think that it will be in the long-term interest of the Middle East for Palestine to be a state," she said, adding that "the territory that the Palestinians currently inhabit, and whatever additional territory they will obtain through the peace negotiations," should be considered "a functioning modern state."

The White House, seemingly uncomfortable with her statement, clarified that she was expressing a personal view. Her willingness to embrace the Palestinians soon caused another problem. In 1999, Ehrman accompanied Hillary Clinton on a trip to Ramallah, during which Clinton listened to Suha Arafat, the wife of the Palestinian Authority leader Yasir Arafat, deliver a speech in Arabic accusing the Israeli government of gassing Palestinian women and children. At the conclusion of the remarks, Clinton embraced Suha Arafat and offered a customary peck on the cheek. The moment news of the kiss hit the wires, a high-ranking Clinton administration official placed an angry call to the cellphone of Rob Malley, a Middle East adviser to the president, who was traveling with the first lady, demanding that he fix the problem. But the damage to Hillary Clinton was done.

The next day, some New York Jewish leaders seized on the incident to discredit Hillary Clinton's candidacy for the United States Senate, which was unofficially well underway. The New York Post ran a front-page headline reading "Shame on Hillary." It was around this time that she enrolled in political Hebrew School. Under the tutelage of the senior New York senator, Chuck Schumer, she became extremely adept at winning the trust of audiences who held an absolute pro-Israel position. Schumer did, however, need to assure attendees at one campaign fund-raiser that "she will look to me to see how to vote" on Jewish issues.

Clinton was elected to the Senate in 2000 and struck a tone that was in sync with the Bush administration, which had aligned itself with the Israeli right. In 2007, she went further than the administration when she released a position paper calling for "an undivided Jerusalem" as the capital of Israel. In 2008, as a presidential candidate, she warned Tehran that America would "totally obliterate" Iran if it attacked Israel.

By this time, Clinton was an Aipac favorite, and Aipac had changed from the time that Ehrman had worked there. Founded in 1954 to strengthen the U.S.-Israel relationship regardless of political ideology, the lobby has become increasingly conservative in its politics and Orthodox in its membership, while developing an unparalleled network of donors around the country. Its financial power, demonstrated at annual megaconferences that bring together presidential candidates and congressional power brokers, has translated into legislative might. Aipac-backed bills — on, for example, support for the Israeli military or sanctions against Iran — usually pass unanimously in Congress.

Many liberal Jews, alienated by Aipac over the years, were encouraged when Barack Obama ran against Clinton in the 2008 presidential primary. They appreciated that he took a more nuanced position when it came to supporting Israel, one that better reflected the political debate within Israel and among American Jews. They saw him as the rare presidential candidate who spoke their language and who seemed willing to push Israel toward peace. They expressed relief when he said that you could be committed to Israel while criticizing the policies of the right-wing government. "I think there is a strain within the pro-Israel community that says unless you adopt an unwavering pro-Likud approach to Israel that you're opposed to Israel, that you're anti-Israel," he said. "And that can't be the measure of our friendship with Israel."

Once elected, Obama seemed to understand that he needed someone to lend him credibility with the Israeli government and its American defenders, a tough friend of Israel who could muscle the country away from settlements and toward a peace agreement. An aide to Obama called Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish American Organizations, and asked him to call Hillary Clinton to see if she would be "agreeable" to being named secretary of state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Early in her tenure as secretary, she was harshly critical of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and the country's increasingly conservative culture, surprising and appalling Aipac and many of her supporters in New York. She excoriated Israel's settlement growth and the "antidemocratic" tendencies of its right wing and also the practice, in the ultra-Orthodox Jewish community, of gender discrimination "reminiscent of Rosa Parks."

As Clinton pressured Israel to make peace from the State Department, the Obama administration looked to J Street, a new and progressive Jewish lobby, to give members of Congress financial backing and credibility on Israel so that they could support the president without fear of being cash-starved by Aipac or called anti-Israel. J Street boasts of helping Obama defeat an Aipac-backed bill that would have scuttled the administration's Iran nuclear talks. For the most part, though, unquestioning support for Israel has remained dominant in Washington. Even before she left the administration, Clinton essentially shed any pretense that she was still playing the role of impartial arbiter. As Israel flouted her own government's demand that it not build more settlements in East Jerusalem, Clinton spoke so effusively about Netanyahu at a December 2012 conference that political observers considered the speech tantamount to a presidential announcement. Since then, Clinton has further distanced herself from her job as secretary of state, making light of her role as Netanyahu's disciplinarian for Obama and calling herself the president's "designated yeller."

This explanation of Clinton's earlier rebukes of Israel is already gospel among her pro-Israel supporters. Lewis, a backer of the independent super PAC Ready for Hillary, told me that Clinton "was not in the lead on making policy."

Clinton's return to campaign form has left liberal Zionists with little choice other than rationalization. "I sense that the people who advise Hillary Clinton on Jewish politics came of age in an era when the rules of the game were different," Jeremy Ben-Ami, the founder and president of J Street, told me, suggesting that the time of reflexive support for Israel, regardless of their government's policies, had ended. When I asked if he could persuade Clinton that such a position was no longer tenable, he answered, not so convincingly, "We definitely need to try."

Other liberal Zionists are hoping that Bill Clinton could be a more sympathetic voice within a Clinton White House. After Zemel's Rosh Hashana sermon, in which he talked about the need for "Jewish genius" to solve the problem in Israel, Al From told me, "Bill Clinton has this little bit of genius."

Zemel concurred. "I want Hillary," he said. "So I can get a second round with Bill."

Over the summer and fall, many of Micah's congregants and other influential liberal Zionists around Washington aired their discomfort with Clinton on Facebook and in op-ed pages and journals. But they were made even more uneasy by the specter of an increasingly loud Jewish left wing that is openly hostile to Israel and advocates punishing it economically.

At a Shabbat service in August, Zemel's 22-year-old daughter, Ronit, a senior at Macalester College in St. Paul, sat in the front row of Micah's sanctuary. She listened to her father say, "What is needed to make peace between the peoples of these two lands is probably more than humans can summon," which is from "My Promised Land: The Triumph and Tragedy of Israel," a history of the country's ethical struggle since its independence, by Ari Shavit, a columnist for the left-leaning Israeli paper Haaretz.

In a few days Zemel's daughter would head back to school, where she had served as co-chairwoman of the student wing of J Street, known as J Street U. The idea of going back to campus, she told me, gave her "the worst feeling ever." She felt besieged by pro-Palestinian groups advocating boycott, divestment and sanctions, or B.D.S., modeled after the boycott movement that helped end South African apartheid policies. "I'm more ashamed of Israel now," she said. "But I am viewing it from a place of love and caring, and I know that they are not. So I'm very scared." Shavit expressed a similar concern. In November, he visited Temple Micah, and speaking as a "liberal to liberals" he worried about young American Jews losing their Jewish identity and drifting away from Israel.

Chief among the fears of liberal Zionists were groups like Jewish Voice for Peace, which in June helped provide a Jewish seal of approval for the Presbyterian Church to divest from companies seen as profiting from Israeli occupation of the West Bank. Rebecca Vilkomerson, the executive director of Jewish Voice for Peace, said that as a result of the war, 60,000 new supporters signed the group's online petitions or open letters in liberal Jewish publications.

Vilkomerson (whose sister, an entertainment writer, is a friend of mine) said she felt no sympathy for the concerns of the liberal Zionist agonistes, whom she considered toothless and intellectually dishonest in their attempts to reconcile their liberal values with Israel's right-wing government. She reserved special indignation for what she referred to as “PEPs,” or politicians who were “progressive except for Palestine.”

Vilkomerson pointed to a Pew poll taken during the summer, which showed that the core constituencies of the Democratic electorate, people under 30, African-Americans and Hispanics, blamed Israel more than Hamas for the war. She was also encouraged by the angry response of some delegates at the 2012 Democratic National Convention who booed an amendment to the party platform that would recognize Jerusalem as the present and future capital of Israel. If the left wing makes the case to Clinton and her Democratic successors that the political calculus on Israel is changing, then, Vilkomerson predicted, they will be forced to recalibrate their position. Hillary Clinton, she said, “is totally politically calculating.”

While Lewis says that Clinton should “take seriously” the increasingly intense conversation about the appropriate support for Israel, Clinton, at least for now, is not budging. After all, Elizabeth Warren, the Massachusetts senator often mentioned as a more liberal alternative to Clinton, has taken much the same position. “I would not argue that this is something to worry about,” Lewis told me.

In November, Zemel took 30 of his congregants on the synagogue’s annual trip to Israel. It’s exactly the sort of pilgrimage that Zionists consider the most effective means of strengthening a connection to Judaism and, as a result, of increasing American Jewish support for Israel. But Zemel and his delegation saw signs in the region that troubled them. A third Intifada seemed possible in East Jerusalem, where Muslims and Jews clashed over holy places. Palestinian extremists ran over Israeli commuters and stabbed worshiping rabbis. Right-wing Israeli government ministers promoted the spread of settlements and proclaimed the death of the two-state solution. In November, they also proposed a bill that seemed to dilute Israel’s commitment to democracy by explicitly declaring the country a Jewish state. Netanyahu forced the justice minister, Tzipi Livni, a favorite of American liberal Zionists, out of his government.

“One is torn,” Zemel told me from Tel Aviv. “I can’t imagine not wanting to come to Israel every chance I get. But what would happen if an Israeli government were to decide, ‘O.K., we’re going to declare the entire West Bank to be part of Greater Israel and we’re not going to grant the Palestinians full citizenship.’ How could I then come to visit this country? But how could I not come? I just can’t imagine it.”

Zemel always felt Israel should be able to chart its own course, without the United States or any other nation forcing its hand. But as the tour progressed and the group encountered stun grenades and concrete blocks in Jerusalem, Zemel said he began to believe that Israel needed an emergency intervention from the United States.

“If a person is killing themselves,” he told me. “You save them from themselves.”

But there is a sinking feeling among many liberal Zionists that Washington’s opportunity for intervention has passed. The Obama administration’s efforts to broker an Israeli-Palestinian peace have collapsed and its attention has turned to terrorist groups like ISIS and the curbing of Iran’s nuclear program. European nations, frustrated with what they consider America’s unwillingness to force Israel to get out of the West Bank and embrace the two-state solution, have begun to recognize Palestine. Clinton has shown little inclination to risk political damage by reprising her old role as a friend and a critic of Israel.

At a Brookings Institution forum in Washington on Dec. 5, Clinton addressed an audience of American Jews and Israeli officials, including Livni. She offered platitudes about the two-state solution and studiously avoided any of her past criticism of Israel. On her way out, as she shook hands and gave hugs, I asked Livni, who is trying to oust Netanyahu in elections in March, if America’s liberal Jews should have any expectation that a new, more progressive Israeli government could form. “It’s not only their hope,” she said. “It’s our hope.”

Zemel was discouraged by Clinton’s remarks. “She didn’t say anything,” he complained. But he, too, clung to the idea that she had a private view that coincided with his own. “I hope,” he said. It’s a theme that Zemel often returns to when talking about Israel. On Yom Kippur, the holiest day in Judaism, he told a Micah congregant who was depressed about Israel’s rightward lurch that Jews were “a people of endless patience” who “view things in the long term.” At the breaking of the fast at his home that evening, he showed off a 19th century text that belonged to his grandfather, when he led the (at the time) liberal Zionist Organization of America — which is now a right-wing group financed in part by Adelson. Despite everything, Zemel remained optimistic, telling me that the song “Somewhere Over the Rainbow” was a Zionist anthem. “There’s no place like home? What could be more Jewish?”

BuzzFeed: "Ted Cruz: 'I Can Only Laugh' When Obama, Clinton Discuss Income Inequality"

By Andrew Kaczynski

December 18, 2014, 1:31 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] "And income inequality — you know, I have to admit, I can only laugh any time President Obama or Hillary Clinton talk about income inequality, because it's increased dramatically under their administration."

Ted Cruz is attacking President Obama and Hillary Clinton on income inequality.

"Over the last six years of the Obama presidency, the rich have gotten richer," Cruz said Thursday on the Laura Ingraham Show. "The top one percent today earn a higher share of our income than any year since 1928. And income inequality — you know, I have to admit, I can only laugh any time President Obama or Hillary Clinton talk about income inequality, because it's increased dramatically under their administration. And the working men and women are getting hammered. There are 92 million Americans right now not working — we have the lowest labor force participation since 1978."

President Obama has often discussed closing the gap between the rich and the poor in the United States, making inequality the theme of a December 2013 speech on economic mobility.

"The combined trends of increased inequality and decreasing mobility pose a fundamental threat to the American Dream, our way of life, and what we stand for around the globe. And it is not simply a moral claim that I'm making here. There are practical consequences to rising inequality and reduced mobility."

Clinton likewise made income inequality the theme of a speech at the New America Foundation in May of this year.

"Now, these are the kinds of daily struggles of millions and millions of Americans. Those fighting to get into the middle class and those fighting to stay there. And it was something of a wakeup call when it was recently reported that Canadian middle-class incomes are now higher than in the United States. They are working fewer hours for more pay than Americans are, enjoying a stronger safety net, living longer on average, and facing less income inequality."

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Rand Paul supports opening up relations with Cuba"

By Sean Sullivan

December 18, 2014, 1:20 p.m. EST

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) says he supports opening up relations with Cuba, a position that that puts him at odds with much of the would-be Republican presidential field.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The 50-year embargo just hasn’t worked,” Paul told Tom Roten of WVHU in Huntington, West Virginia on Thursday, according to the Associated Press. "If the goal is regime change, it sure doesn’t seem to be working and probably it punishes the people more than the regime because the regime can blame the embargo for hardship."

He added: “In the end, I think opening up Cuba is probably a good idea."

President Obama announced Wednesday that the United States would reopen its embassy in Havana and ease restrictions on travel and commerce with Cuba.

Other potential White House hopefuls have spoken out against Obama's decision. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal (R) took issue with it. So did former Florida governor Jeb Bush (R).

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R) has not weighed in.

On the Democratic side, presumed frontrunner Hillary Clinton said she supports Obama's decision.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: “Dems blame 2014 drubbing on failed economic message”

By Jonathan Easley

December 18, 2014, 10:13 a.m. EST

The economy is far and away the most important issue to voters, and Democrats’ failure to make a compelling argument on that front sunk them in the midterms, the party's analysis of the 2014 election cycle found.

“This data underscores a deeper problem and is an admonishment to Democrats to use the coming months to fashion, hone, and then campaign on an economic plan,” the analysis, authored by Democratic pollster Celinda Lake, reads in part.

“If Democrats fail on this front – even in 2016 with a broader, more diverse, and more progressive electorate – they could well face an election outcome not altogether different from what they just experienced last month.”

The George Washington University Battleground Poll, which served as a basis for the Democratic analysis, found that a plurality, 29 percent, believe the economy is the most important issue facing the new Congress. That’s a nearly two-to-one advantage over immigration, the next closest issue.

A strong majority, 77 percent, said they’re at least somewhat worried about current economic conditions. Voters in the Middle Class are the most pessimistic than other groups on the direction of the economy.

“Two years into Obama’s second term, the American public is worried and highly pessimistic about the state of the economy and the prospects of improvement for the next generation,” said Christopher Arterton, the director of the GW poll. “When the new Congress convenes in January, voters want the politicians in Washington to address this issue above all else.”

The analysis found that Democrats’ focused too much on “piecemeal policy proposals” like the minimum wage and equal pay for women, which “struck voters as falling well short of the level of change necessary to set our country and our economy back on track.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some Democrats are already taking this message to heart.

Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) said last month that Democrats blew it when they came into power in 2008 by spending all of their political capital on healthcare instead of measures to help the Middle Class.

And this week, groups on the left launched an effort to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) for president, believing her message of economic populism is what's missing in the Democratic Party.

"Tell me who is ahead on the economy in 2016 and I'll tell you who is going to be president," Lake said at a Christian Science Monitor event on Thursday.

Some political watchers are doubtful that Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton, with her close ties to Wall Street and lucrative public speaking gigs, is well-suited to be the party's standard bearer on that front.

But Lake argued that if Democrats can fashion the right message, polling shows voters are on board with the core tenet of liberalism: that the government exists "to help Americans overcome challenges that would otherwise be insurmountable."

"The error of the Democratic Party may not be in standing for an active federal government, but instead failing to articulate that role with specificity and in ways that relate directly to both the country's and individual voters' needs and priorities," Lake wrote.

Fifty-two percent of voters in the GW poll said the government should do more to solve problems and meet the needs of people, against 48 percent who said the best thing the government can do for the economy is to not meddle in the markets.

"Far from running away from their vision of government, Democrats should embrace it and –without getting lost in abstract discussions of process – make their case for a government that is active, engaged, and accountable in its efforts to put ordinary people first and to restore the promise of the American Dream," the analysis said.

"Once Republicans take control of both Houses of Congress in the New Year, the pressure on Democrats to unify and offer a bold economic plan for the country will only increase."

Republicans swept into power in the midterm elections, picking up 13 seats in the House and gaining their largest majority since World War II, while picking up a solid majority in the Senate.

NBC News: "Why 2016 Will Be a Battle Between the Grassroots and the Donors"

By Leigh Ann Caldwell

December 18, 2014, 10:36 a.m. EST

While the majority of Americans aren't yet paying attention to a presidential race, the chase for precious financial support is already well underway. Donors -- that active subset of the American citizenship -- are watching developments closely and actively working to ensure that their candidate, or cause, comes out on top.

The problem is that major disagreement exists between the moneyed class that is critical to give a candidate the resources needed for a national campaign and the activists that are more far more numerous and active in each party's primary process. And it's a bridge that candidates are going to have to work hard to close.

On the Democratic side, the grassroots has been energized by the populist message of Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, who insists she has no plans to jump in the race. Candidate or not, the liberal group MoveOn.org Political Action has pledged to spend $1 million to begin organizing activists in the first two critical nominating states in Warren's name. Another progressive group, Democracy For America, has also pledged $250,000 to the effort.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Wednesday the group held a high-profile meeting, recruiting volunteers to open offices and put the infrastructure in place for a potential Warren race. They plan to do the same in New Hampshire in early January.

Warren has sparked the excitement of a critical component of the Democratic Party's activists with her anti-Wall Street crusade and support for the working class. But $1.2 million is far from the tens of millions Warren would need to run a presidential primary campaign. And her distaste for Wall Street has bought her few friends among the high-dollar moneyed class who could fund a presidential run. In addition, her supporters might be rabid, but they still have a lot of work to do to convince casual Democratic voters. In a new NBC News poll, only 37 percent of Democrats back Warren. Even though Democracy For America's members support a Warren run, it's leader, former Vermont Governor and presidential candidate Howard Dean, said he would like to see a Hillary Clinton presidency.

Hillary Clinton, meanwhile, has the long-standing support of wealthy Democrats, gathered between her and Bill Clinton over more than two decades in politics. This would be the fourth presidential campaign for a Clinton, giving them a deep rolodex of donors and tremendous name recognition, evident in the NBC poll that found 82 percent of Democrats approve of Clinton. And her more moderate stance on regulation and the economy doesn't scare the financial industry.

"If it turns out to be Jeb versus Hillary we would love that and either outcome would be fine," a Republican-leaning Wall Street lawyer told Politico in April. "It's Rand Paul or Ted Cruz versus someone like Elizabeth Warren that would be everybody's worst nightmare."

Victoria Kaplan, field director for Run Warren Run, which is part of MoveOn Action, said that Warren has proven to be a prolific fundraiser and that if she decided to jump in, she'd have "significant support."

"Washington DC insiders like to think they know what it takes to be president," Kaplan added.

Warren has raised a significant amount of money, bringing in more than $42 million for her inaugural Senate race in 2012. But she was running against a Republican in one of the most high profile races in the country. The competition for funds against Clinton would be much different. One of Warren's biggest contributors was EMILY's List, whose president has been mentioned for the role of Clinton's campaign manager.

The gap between the donors and the grassroots is just as exposed on the Republican side, too. Now that former Florida Governor Jeb Bush has inched closer to a presidential run by "exploring" the presidency, donors are thrilled.

David Beightol called Bush talented and said he's the only one - other than Mitt Romney - who knows what it takes to run a presidential campaign as both his brother and father have done it.

"He's the guy with the talent … and I think he'll win," Beightol said.

Donors want electability and they think a moderate candidate has a better chance of winning the general election. Numerous articles have been written about donors hoping to "clear the field" here and here.

Meanwhile, the grassroots of the party is not so excited about a potential Bush candidacy. Outspoken syndicated radio host based in Iowa, Steve Deace, put out an advisory saying Bush will "never" be president because of conservatives' dissatisfaction with the former governor. According to a new NBC News poll released Wednesday, only 31 percent of Republicans could support a Bush presidency.

Putting the Bush name aside, which receives mixed reviews in Republican circles, activists are skeptical of his support of comprehensive immigration reform and education standards known as Common Core. Bush himself even said he wouldn't move to the right just to obtain the nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Unlike donors, conservative activists don't buy the notion of electability.

"We have been sold a bill of goods about electability and moderation. The last time I checked with President Romney and President McCain, that didn't work," Iowa leader of social conservatives Bob Van der Plaats said.

The grassroots are more pumped about a potential run by a social conservative like former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee or former Pennsylvania Senator Rick Santorum. Some in the base are charged over the possibility of a bid by Kentucky Senator Rand Paul or tea party favorite Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas. Then there's neurosurgeon Ben Carson whose direct and sometimes brazen remarks electrify the base.

Can a candidate with the support of donors and not the base win a primary? Or vice versa?

Republican donor and bundler Beightol insists that conservative activists will grow to like Bush when they let him explain his positions.

"Once they hear him speak about those two things (Common Core and immigration), he'll be fine," Beightol predicted.

A Republican strategist challenged the idea "that big money interest is trying to marshal all the support." He pointed to grassroots candidate Rick Santorum's unexpected win in the Iowa caucuses in 2012 over the well-financed establishment favorite Mitt Romney.

While Santorum gave Romney a solid run, igniting social conservatives and outperforming most political watchers, in the end, Romney won that nomination. While Santorum had the support of one sugar daddy, entrepreneur Foster Friess who financed most of his campaign, Romney raised $60 million more than Santorum during the primary.

Candice Nelson, director of the Campaign Management Institute at American University, said the role of money is significant.

"If you have a donor base, you have the resources to get your message out and to build a grassroots campaign," Nelson added. "You need money to do everything else."

Romney's primary win, despite luke-warm feelings from the Republican base about the candidate, was not an anomaly. In presidential primaries dating back to at least 1992, the candidate with the most money won. For instance, in 2008, Republican nominee John McCain, another moderate that conservatives were not thrilled about - who even ran out of money at one point in the primary - had raised $36 million by the time his closest competitor, Huckabee, who dropped out of the race in early March. Huckabee amassed only about $16 million, according the Center for Responsive Politics.

On the Democratic side, then-candidate Barack Obama outraised Hillary Clinton in the long-drawn out primary that didn't end until June. Notably, Obama was extremely successful at turning his grassroots support into a donor base while also, eventually, appealing to the high-donor class.

In 2004, John Kerry outraised Howard Dean, mostly by giving himself loans from his vast fortune. And in 2000, Al Gore had more money than Bill Bradley and George Bush far outraised John McCain. The pattern continues: Republican Bob Dole outraised Pat Buchanan in 1996 and Bill Clinton outraised Jerry Brown and Paul Tsongas in 1992.

In most presidential races since 1972, however, the era of unlimited donations to third party political groups didn't exist. Kathy Kiely, managing director of the Sunlight Foundation said, that now with the advent of unlimited spending, big donors are able to deepen the divide between what the grassroots wants and what the donors want.

"Prior to the emergence of super PACs, you had to have the ability to raise a lot of money in small amounts. You had to be able to get a very broad base of support and mobilize that support over the long haul," Kiely said.

With unlimited spending, the gap between donors and voters might be more difficult to close.

New York Times: “As 2016 Nears, Hillary Clinton Keeps in Mind Mistakes of 2008 Campaign”

By Amy Chozick

December 18, 2014

During the 2008 Democratic presidential primaries, Hillary Rodham Clinton emphasized her strength and experience over her softer, more relatable side. Today, she gushes about having “that grandmother glow.”

As she lost the nomination to President Obama, Mrs. Clinton was accused of being wooden and overly shielded by staff members. Last month, she mingled casually at an Upper West Side apartment, greeting donors and shunning a podium and rope line.

And in 2008, Mrs. Clinton’s best asset, her husband, Bill Clinton, became an albatross. Today, the former president has a tough-minded chief of staff from Mrs. Clinton’s world who tries to keep close control over his events — and his occasional off-script remarks.

Little by little, Mrs. Clinton is taking steps that suggest she has learned from the mistakes, both tactical and personal, of her failed candidacy. After more than six years of pundits dissecting what went wrong in 2008, her circle of advisers is beginning to draft a blueprint for a different kind of campaign. And although Mrs. Clinton has since bolstered her public image while serving as secretary of state, her next campaign will in part be assessed by her ability to avoid the errors of the last one.

“Was it the best managed campaign? Of course not, they lost,” the Democratic strategist Donna Brazile said of 2008. “But what lessons will they apply to the future if she decides to run?”

Some things have clearly changed: Those close to Mrs. Clinton now embrace a view that her gender can be more of an asset than a liability. But familiar hazards remain, especially the air of inevitability that seems to surround the Clinton camp, along with the lack of a broader rationale for her candidacy.

“Inevitability is not a message,” said Terry Shumaker, a prominent New Hampshire Democrat and former United States ambassador. “It’s not something you can run on,” he added.

These topics are being quietly discussed at private dinners with donors, at strategy talks hosted by an outside “super PAC” and in casual conversation as Mrs. Clinton greets friends at holiday parties and a Clinton Foundation fund-raiser in New York.

“If she runs, it will be different,” said Mrs. Clinton’s spokesman, Nick Merrill.

Last month, at a gathering hosted by Ready for Hillary, a super PAC intended to build grass-roots support for a Clinton candidacy, strategists explained to donors over lunch and in presentations that Mrs. Clinton would need to run in 2016 the way she did after she began to struggle in the 2008 primary season.

By the time the delegate tallies favored Mr. Obama, Mrs. Clinton began to show a vulnerable, less scripted and entitled side. She adopted a message focused on lifting the middle class, and she connected with women and white working-class voters over kitchen table issues. She won primaries in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

“I always found it remarkable that working-class women could connect to her life despite the fact that this is somebody who operated in the highest circles in America,” said Geoff Garin, a pollster who succeeded Mark Penn as the campaign’s chief strategist in 2008.

Mrs. Clinton is keeping a quiet schedule over the next several weeks. She is holding frequent meetings to listen directly to the type of strategic advice that during her last campaign was filtered through a tiny cadre of loyal but sparring advisers.

Most of those advisers, including Mr. Penn, still have ties to the Clintons, which makes some of the more than a dozen supporters interviewed for this article wonder whether the personnel problems and infighting that plagued the last campaign could really be resolved in another one.

Ready for Hillary, which since its inception has tried to signal that things must be done differently in 2016, counts former White House aides like Harold M. Ickes, Craig T. Smith and Ann Lewis as advisers. But it also includes Jeremy Bird and Mitch Stewart, Obama organizers whose presence Mr. Ickes called “Exhibit A of new ways of doing things.”

Obama operatives like Buffy Wicks and Jim Messina have been brought on to run another pro-Clinton super PAC, Priorities USA Action.

“Inner circles change over time depending on the nature of the enterprise,” Mr. Ickes said. “There are always people with their noses out of joint,” he added, but the Clintons “are good at picking people.”

Super PACs are ostensibly banned from collaboration with candidates, and Ready for Hillary does not constitute Mrs. Clinton’s innermost circle. The group, run by a mix of young devotees and older loyalists, will dissolve if she declares her candidacy. But its efforts in the long pre-campaign period, particularly in the approach to data and outreach to young college students, are likely to influence how the official campaign would function.

The group has also helped Mrs. Clinton keep well-meaning, but distracting, supporters at bay. It is a strategy that Mr. Obama adopted in 2007 to make sure that supporters felt useful and included without allowing the candidate to become overwhelmed with advice, as Mrs. Clinton did in 2008.

Mr. Bird called the approach “respect, empower, include” and said, “It’s a consistent challenge all campaigns have.”

This is perhaps a bigger challenge for Mrs. Clinton, given that she and her husband have built an extraordinary network of friends, donors and advisers over their decades in public life, all of whom will be invested in trying to get them back to the White House.

“She will be very careful to make sure there are clear lines of authority and that the people in charge are not in charge because they are old cronies, but because they’re the smartest people to run the campaign,” said Richard Socarides, a former White House aide.

In 2008, the smartest person on Mrs. Clinton’s campaign, her husband, became a liability. Mr. Clinton enraged black voters by comparing Mr. Obama’s victory in the South Carolina primary to the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson’s 1984 and 1988 victories in the state and called Mr. Obama’s antiwar position “the biggest fairy tale I’ve ever seen.”

Since then, Mr. Clinton has regained his status as the party’s most powerful surrogate, as demonstrated in a blockbuster speech at the 2012

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic National Convention. But the former president is also famously defensive, especially when his legacy and his wife are under attack, both of which would happen in a 2016 campaign.

Mr. Clinton's chief of staff, Tina Flournoy, who is close to Mrs. Clinton, is trying to keep a careful watch on the former president's events while closely collaborating with his wife's office, said several people with knowledge of Ms. Flournoy's approach who spoke on the condition of anonymity to preserve their relationships with Mr. Clinton.

Ultimately, though, topics that his office would like to avoid, namely 2016 and any criticism of the current administration, come up.

For example, last month in Little Rock, Ark., a Politico reporter, Mike Allen, lobbed a couple of unexpected questions at Mr. Clinton after he delivered prepared remarks at the "Playbook Cocktails with Bill Clinton" event.

Mr. Clinton made news by questioning whether Mr. Obama's delay on an immigration overhaul affected the weak turnout of Latinos in the midterm elections. Mr. Clinton's team appeared livid with the organizers about the unanticipated questions.

"I had misunderstood the parameters, and I'm very sorry about that," Mr. Allen said. A spokesman for Mr. Clinton declined to comment.

People close to Mrs. Clinton say she smartly adjusts and moves forward after making errors — whether her heavy-handed approach to overhauling health care as first lady or her remark to ABC News in June that she and her husband were "dead broke" when they left the White House.

Or, as Mrs. Clinton liked to say in the 2008 campaign, when she warned voters not to be swept up by Mr. Obama's promise to bring hope and change to Washington: "Fool me once, shame on you. Fool me twice, shame on me."

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "The Associated Press just did something very smart"

By Chris Cillizza

December 18, 2014, 1:17 p.m. EST

Here's an announcement from the AP that you probably missed today:

"Building on The Associated Press' unmatched presence in all 50 U.S. statehouses, we are adding to our competitive advantage by creating a team of state government specialists.

"As announced today to the AP staff, the specialists will collaborate with statehouse reporters, as well as on their own projects and stories focused on government accountability and strong explanatory reporting. Their over-arching goal will be 'to show how state government is impacting the lives of people across the country,' said Brian Carovillano, managing editor for U.S. news."

This is a very, very good idea.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As I have written many times in this space, one of the undertold-but-massively-important stories of the shrinkage of mainstream media organizations over the last decade is the disappearance of really good state capitol coverage. Many state and regional newspapers who took as their prime mission covering the machinations -- politically and from a policy perspective -- of each of the state capitols have been forced to make deep cuts in their budgets for that sort of reporting. And, for the most part -- and the WaPo may well be an exception in the Jeff Bezos era -- major national news organizations haven't been able to adequately fill that void.

The result? Not surprisingly, less coverage -- and, as importantly, fewer reporters with deep institutional knowledge -- of state capitols. That's particularly bad given how much is happening -- particularly when it comes to policy incubation -- at the state level of late, and how much it affects the national policy debate.

The AP never really left state capitol coverage. (They were all over Kansas Gov. Sam Brownback's problems in the state -- and with his state legislature -- over the last few years.) But, adding an entirely new team to elevate to do deeper explanatory and investigative work in state capitols shows that the AP understands just how much they matter not only to states but to the federal government.

And that's not even mentioning the fact that at least eight governors (or former governors) -- Mike Huckabee, Rick Perry, Jeb Bush, Scott Walker, Chris Christie, John Kasich and Bobby Jindal for Republicans, Martin O'Malley for Democrats -- are in some stage of considering a run for president in 2016. Given how drastically over-covered Hillary Clinton's expected presidential campaign will be -- particularly given the small chance she will face a genuinely competitive primary -- having more people in these state capitols to mine the records of the various governors running for the big office is a smart investment.

Then there is the intangible value of having reporting tentacles in a state. The Post provides a great example in its Virginia coverage. Roz Helderman's time spent in Richmond was absolutely in integral to her series of stories that led to the conviction of Virginia Gov. Bob McDonnell on 11 counts of corruption. The Post's commitment to Virginia also meant that T. Rees Shapiro was perfectly positioned to raise questions about Rolling Stone's story of a sexual assault at the University of Virginia or scramble dozens of reporters to the mass shooting at Virginia Tech in the middle of the last decade. Or that the Post can be all over the absolutely remarkable/appalling story of state Del. Joe Morrissey.

In our own small way, we here at The Fix have done what we can to preserve the importance of state capitol reporting with our annual list of the best state-based political reporters. (We last did this in 2013 and plan to update our list next year.) And the Post announced just today a partnership with the Texas Tribune, one of the best state-reporting models -- ok, the best model -- in the country.

State-level political journalism has taken a huge hit over the last 10 years. Let's hope the AP's move is the leading edge of a journalistic reinvestment in the states.

Politico: “Clinton aide met with Warren-aligned liberal group”

By Maggie Haberman

December 18, 2014, 11:42 a.m. EST

A Hillary Clinton adviser recently met with the head of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, the liberal issues group most closely affiliated with Sen. Elizabeth Warren, both sides confirmed.

The meeting is the first sign that Clinton’s team is trying to build a bridge with those who are actively supporting Warren, whom many on the left want to see challenge Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016.

MSNBC first reported that the meeting might take place. On Thursday, PCCC founder Adam Green confirmed that he had met with a Clinton aide in the last few weeks, but declined to identify the aide or describe what was discussed.

Although Green's group has been tied to Warren, whose progressive stands have earned her adulation but who insists she's not running for president, the PCCC has not joined the "Draft Warren" efforts being led by MoveOn.org.

MoveOn, which has a wide membership that began during the Bill Clinton impeachment days and morphed into anti-war activism during George W. Bush's presidency, has stepped up with a $1 million down payment for the draft effort.

Another group, Ready for Warren, has struggled mightily with fundraising after being disavowed by the Massachusetts senator. The Howard Dean-founded Democracy for America also is spending $250,000 on the draft effort, which had an Iowa kick-off on Wednesday evening.

Although it has stayed out of the draft effort, Green's group is pushing forward with a focus on Warren's message of economic populism. Her stances gained new potency last week as she fought against congressional approval of the "cromnibus" bill and a provision that benefited big banks.

"Our unique role is, we're trying to impact the playing field," Green said.

A Clinton spokesman acknowledged the meeting but declined comment and would not provide details.

Clinton, a former secretary of state and former senator, has not commented in-depth about the cromnibus bill. But earlier this week, she gave a very liberal-leaning speech on police relations with the black community.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall in Cincinnati, OH

Hello All,

I was not able to get into today's event due to it being a closed ticketed event for pre-screened "undecideds." However, I was able to track the event via online streaming video. Below are the notes from that viewing.

Cincinnati, OH - McCain Town Hall at Xavier University - 06/26/8

Background Details:

- Closed Event - ticketed audience members of "undecideds"
- Overflow room also ticketed.
- Family Members of Campaign Staff allowed to attend and sit in main room, while other ticketed audience members were seated in overflow
- Tight Security
- A dozen protesters were outside of entrance with signs, Local Press were filming them

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Opening Remarks

Sub Prime problem in Ohio and America – time for Washington to act. Every homeowner should be able to go down and make an application for a FEC guarantee for the current cost of their home. One of the fundamentals of the American Dream is for an individual to own a home

I always but my country first – example: given chance to go home early as POW but chose not to b/c I put my country first

Reform the way we do business in Washington DC – stop out of control corrupt spending – earmark is a corrupting process. Promises to veto all big spending bills

Straight Talk – Social Security won't be there for today's generation unless we fix it

We have to sit down together like Tip O'Neil and Ronald Regan

Health Care was main issue, still important, but transcendent issue is energy

Lexington Project – Americans have never met a challenge we could not win - We can't have business as usual, automobiles with battery power, flex fuels hybrids. We need to have automobiles that are independent of oil.

Spread of technology – like cell phones price will go down

We need all alternatives; one of them is Nuclear Power. French and European countries use Nuclear power. Clean Coal can be used as a primary energy source.

Sending money to countries that don't like us very much, and it's a fact that some of the money is going to terrorist

I have traveled often times on your money, and I have seen it I believe Climate Change is real.

Off shore drilling: We should allow the states to decide. It can have a beneficial effect. It would send a signal to the Middle East, that we will have less dependency on theirs. Is it an immediate solution? Look I'll give you straight talk we did not get into this yesterday, we will not get out of it tomorrow

Things are tough in Afghanistan. Progress in Iraq is fragile, but we are winning. Iraq was mishandled for 4 years, but with Gen P and the great men and woman of the military we are winning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

My Opinion is we would have had a larger war if we withdrew, with Iranian influence and stronghold of Al Qaeda

This is going to be a hard struggle, we will meet this challenge. We are a shinning city upon a hill. I can motivate young people to serve a cause greater then their self-interest.

Question 1: Has company that is converting cars to totally electric.

John McCain: What challenges are you facing? What you are doing is a key factor to take us from dependence of foreign oil

John McCain: What can we do for you? I would invest in pure R&D, this technology, Tesla, Volt. BTW volt represents new automobile jobs. Flex Fuel is important too – E85 in all vehicles and gas stations, no more tariffs

Q1 Follow up: Lexington Project? How can we a small group get into this game?

John McCain: Examples of historical figures who can do it as a small group – i.e. Wright brothers, Bill Gates – small groups will most likely play a major role in this new technology Question 2: We tell people that they can not spend more money then they have – gov't does not follow this rule. What can I tell my children?

John McCain: Your concern is the major reason why Congress's approval ratings is so low – we have got to stop the spending spree… stop bridges to no where… stop middle of the night projects being added in. I have never asked for nor received a pork barrel project… Obama has asked for 10's of m(b)illions. He has become entangled in the process. As long as we are borrowing money from somewhere else we are going to have a hurting economy. We have to stop excessive sending and put on a path to a balanced budget –

Q2 followup: How do we fix the process w/o raising taxes?

John McCain: we can do it trough spending cuts – farm bill example

Question 3: Took a trip to El Savador – I learned more then our US representatives there. There economy is based on our money and our economy – my question is about migration. They come here to make money; a large part of their GDP is from remittances. Migration shouldn't start at the border, we should look at the reason as to why people come to the US, and our policy doesn't do well to address that.

John McCain: I hope other students get a chance to go out and see these issues

Economy in South Am is bad, El Salvador hasn't totally recovered from their civil war. Corruption is a problem; we need to make sure our aid goes to the right people. Immigration continues to be a large problem and it is a federal problem. There are all kinds of disjointedness in policy because Federal government has failed. As you know I tried, we reach across the aisle, but we failed. We failed b/c we couldn't assure the American people that we have a secured boarder. It can be done with technology. Any part of any immigration reform has to include a tamper proof id card for temporary workers. If they know that they cannot get a job without going through the proper system then they will not come. Free Trade will help for us to have their services. Mexico is in a tough situation with drug cartels. Mexico is trying to stop the flow of drugs into America. We need to work closely with Mexico to help them stop these drug cartels.

Question 4: Id like to give my support to Condi Rice for VP. How is your foreign policy and education policy different then Bush's?

John McCain: We will never torture again, close Guantanamo Bay – move them to federal prisons. It has become a symbol throughout the world. Tells story of how he and Lindsey Graham met with a former high level AQ member. They asked him how they were able to do it… not enough troops and lawlessness and Abu Ghraib was used as a recruiting tool. There are some differences b/w me and the president. I said that the original strategy was failing.

Education wise, NCLB was a good start, but we need to improve it. But we should not scrape it. NYC and New Orleans is seeing an improvement due to NCLB… competition is vital to better education

Question 5: Health care – we need bipartisan work. How will you get congress to work in a bipartisan method?

John McCain: American people know this system is broken, and we need to get those who don't realize it to know it. There are a lot of solutions and we must address them in a bipartisan manner. Health care needs to be in the hands of the people. Government approved plans and pools for those with chronic problems.

Question 6: I am a Sophomore College student…. What will you do to improve airline industry?

John McCain: Price of oil is a major problem – they pass on the price to travelers…. Lexington project will improve this problem. There is no real good short-term solution. I wanted to give people a summer gas tax holiday. It would have helped the lowest income Americans. We have an air traffic control system that is not much different now then it was in the far past. We are basically in the Stone Age. We have a backward, middle 20th cent. ATC system. ATC and security procedures need to be fixed and efficient.

Question 7: We went into Iraq for many reasons, now it is for stability, you say we are winning. Are we really winning the real war, in Afghanistan? Why are we doing this, what are we accomplishing.

John McCain: We are winning the classic counter-insurgency. Iraq is taking control. In Afghanistan, Taliban is resurging. For many reasons one of the reasons is that the Pakistan military is giving sanctuary to Taliban. Afghanistan is much better off then it was under the Taliban. That is a fact. We went in b/c of 9-11. Our problem probably lends itself to that fact that we need more troops there. We need better government in Afghanistan. Need to make the Pakistanis know that if they allow safe haven to Taliban it will spread into their country. We could not just focus on Afghanistan. We had a significant long-term threat from Iraq. We could not ignore it. Iran poses a threat to the region. I am glad to see that we can get together to put sanctions on Iran. We have to meet this challenge with our Allies.

Q7 follow up: I have been told we spend more per population on each Iraqi then on each American – there are more Taliban - extremist there now then before we went in.

John McCain: I reject your view, I don't agree with the idea that people were better off before we went off then they are now. We can argue about it, but we are there now. The choices are we withdraw too early and have to go back or we win

Question 8: What is your stance on the Kucinich articles of impeachment? Did you agree to meet with the hunger strike professor who has been outside your office?

John McCain:I do not agree w/ impeachment – he is satisfied…. Asked if he met with him… McCain said no, I do not take well to threats Question 9: I wish Obama was here, I am a democrat looking for a candidate. What would you as president do for women rights, how would you address world women rights, I am also concerned about women here in the US, and your views on Supreme Court justices concern me I wish they were more moderate… Equal rights amendment – when will women be added in the constitution?

John McCain: I see that you're a HRC supporter… I have worked with HRC on military issues…. I have asked Obama to have joint town hall meetings, we could have had spirited arguments. I hope that he will agree to do those. This is not a new idea. Barry Goldwater and JFK planned on doing this. I believe that women have become, there are some great women in the senate. Women are getting high positions in elected office, Nancy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Pelosi is an example. But there is still sexism. Women in Afghanistan are better off now then under Taliban. I am prepared to work for equal rights for women throughout the world. Equal Rights amendment is behind us, I did not support it. I have two outstanding women as major members of my campaign.

Closing Remarks:

John McCain: Thanks for being here, I want to hear from everybody. We have to restore America's trust that we will work on their behalf. We will have a respectful debate in America. I have not put partisan politics ahead of America.

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Sunday 07/13/08

Main Topics: Carly Fiorina, Nancy Pfotenhauer, Arnold Schwarzenegger, Gov. Mark Sanford interviewed. McCain's economic policies issue number 1

Summary of Shift: The economy was the number 1 McCain issue today. All the major Sunday shows had surrogates speaking on behalf of McCain and pushing out his economic message. This includes Carly Fiorina and Nancy Pfotenhauer who spoke on the Bush tax cuts, the budget deficit, alternative fuels, and the gas tax holiday. One highlight, South Carolina Governor, and possible vice-president candidate, Mark Sanford was asked to give one example of when McCain was in difference to the economic policies of the Bush administration. After a lot of uh's, and um's, Sanford admitted to being stumped, then provided the issue of NAFTA, which Blitzer properly called out as being the same as Bush. The controversial comments by Phil Gramm were also a major issue of discussion among these surrogates. Chris Matthews examined whether McCain would make a good president and administrator when he can't even run his own campaign. Arnold Schwarzenegger talked about his support for timelines in Iraq as well as dismissing McCain's energy plans and offshore drilling as just "pulling wool over your eyes". The Iraqi National Security Advisor, Mowaffak Al-Rubaie was also interviewed and he re-emphasized the Iraqi call for troop removal timelines. The other non-McCain headlines included the Veep-Stakes, the death of Tony Snow, Iraqi troop pullouts and Iraq's desire for timelines, and there was a new poll out that shows that Obama's numbers are down.

Iraqi National Security Advisor Supports Timelines, Disagrees with McCain's Opposition (CNN, 07/13/08, 11:10am)
MOWAFFAK AL-RUBAIE: yeah. I certainly agree with the prime minister, and I think it's the right time now to start talking about planning a time line horizon. When are we going to see the end of the combat operation? When are we going to see the end of the combat battalion?

WOLF BLITZER: what I hear you saying and certainly what I hear Prime Minister Nouriki Al-Maliki saying is that you certainly could live with a timetable along the lines of what, of what Senator Barack Obama is suggesting, he's been calling for a timetable for some time as opposed to what senator john McCain is saying that there should be no artificial time line, no artificial timetable whatsoever. It should strictly be what's happening on the ground should determine. Are you now moving closer to Senator Obama as opposed to Senator McCain?

AL-RUBAIE: see, I don't think we are negotiating here with adversaries. We're only negotiating with allies and friends and strategic allies. We have said this time and again that Iraq is flying west, is heading west and there's no doubt about it and we would like to have a comprehensive, diplomatic, political, educational, scientific and other fields. These are the important issues. The security issue is probably a small part of this deal.

Gov. Mark Sanford Awkwardly Cannot Identify A Single Example Where McCain Has A Different Economic Position Than Bush (CNN, 07/13/08, 11:13am)
WOLF BLITZER: He's got a new ad, Barack Obama, that's been running this week in some of the battleground states saying if you like the economic policies, what's happened over the past almost eight years under George W. Bush, you're going to love John McCain's economic policies. I'll play a little clip for you.

[Obama's McSame Ad Clip Shown]

BLITZER: Are there any significant economic differences between what the Bush administration has put forward over these many years as opposed to now what John McCain supports?

GOV. MARK SANFORD: Yeah. I mean, for instance, take. You know, uh, uh. Take, for instance, the issue of. Of, um. I'm drawing a blank, and I hate it when I do that, particularly on television. Take, for instance the contrast on NAFTA. I mean, I think that the bigger issue is credibility in where one is coming from, on are they consistent where they come from. John McCain has consistently stood against earmarks throughout his tenure in the United States Senate. Regrettably the President has not been exactly busy with the veto pen on earmarks. I mean, there is just one contrast alone.

BLITZER: But let me get back to, you raised the issue of NAFTA. I don't see, he's a huge supporter of free trade, John McCain, the Bush administration supports free trade. I don't see a big difference between the two of them on NAFTA.

SANFORD: No, I was going to go to a point which is what you would want is consistency with regard to that position. What I think is more relevant is Obama had said during the primary process we've got to go ahead and redraw NAFTA and now his comments have been much more tepid post-primary.

BLITZER: Right, that's a major difference between Obama and the President, but as far as NAFTA is concerned, McCain and Bush are on the same page.

SANFORD: They are, for free trade, and if you think it will help our economy given the troubled economic times that we live in lining up a bunch of trade barriers I think it's at odds with reality that has brought about job growth and a lot of economic job creation.

BLITZER: But beyond the issue of what's called pork barrel spending or the earmarks, is there any other issue on the economic issues, whether tax issues, energy issues, that you see a significant difference between what we've seen in recent years by the Bush administration and what John McCain would do if president?

SANFORD: Yeah, you could go down a number of different bills. If you look at the steel bill that went through way back when, you know, Bush and McCain were on opposite sides on that one.

BLITZER: Well, they were opposite sides early on in 2001 and 2003 on the Bush tax cuts, which John McCain, along with Lincoln Chafee, the only other republican, voted against, but since then John McCain says he endorses making those tax cuts permanent.

SANFORD: Which I agree with, and a lot of folks across South Carolina and across the nation agree with. The issue there is can we get the economic prosperity by raising taxes? I think it's also relevant, again, if you look at the whole issue, you know policy, look at the farm bill. The farm bill was a very modest approach where McCain was to try and say we've got to rein in some of this stuff, you know. Obama talks about change that we can believe in and yet his approach was not to curtail the benefit packages to people who might get as much as, might be making as much as $2 million dollars in a family household or $750,000 household in an individual sense, as an individual farmer, bush and McCain had wanted to lower that to about $200,000, I don't think that you're going to get out of the mess that we're in if you won't even take small approaches to saying we ought to limit subsidies to someone getting $2 million in income.

Headline #3
Pfotenhauer Talks McCain's Economic Policies (CNN, 7/13/08, 11:45am)
NANCY PFOTENHAUER: I do agree that the economy is in very soft shape. Obviously the definition of recession is a technical term but it doesn't feel technical. We all know the economy is struggling right now and what that requires is not just a stimulus package, although senator McCain has been supportive of past efforts along those lines.

WOLF BLITZER: Does he support a new one?

PFOTENHAUER: I think he's open to it but he's more focused on making sure that we embrace the economic policies that are going to bring us economic growth. That is the only way, it's not a band-aid approach. It's a tract change.

BLITZER: And from your perspective it means keeping the tax cuts that the Bush administration passed and making them permanent?

PFOTENHAUER: It means more than that. It means dramatically ratcheting down the growth rate in federal spending. We've had an explosion in spending in the last eight to ten years and, for example, just in the last four since Barack Obama has been here it's gone up about 20 percent and he supported the energy bill, the highway bill, the farm bill. Hundreds of billions of dollars in park barrel spending. So there's a huge problem in spending, we have to slow the growth in spending and we have to slow that down to about 2.4 percent and we have to make sure to pursue free trade. So low taxes, low spending and free trade.

JASON FURMAN: [...] and John McCain was talking about tax cuts for corporations, tax cuts for the most affluent and hoping a bit of that would trickle down to middle class families.

PFOTENHAUER: But he's also very focused on extending the gas tax moratorium because that is very focused on helping people where the energy costs are rising and also would affect grocery prices but it's much more important to focus on the overall economic plan. Senator Obama, the big difference here, Senator Obama is proposing about $1.5 trillion in more spending over the next five years. He is proposing to increase income tax

FURMAN: First of all, the gas tax holiday is a perfect example of the difference between their economic philosophies. John McCain wants to give a tax cut to oil companies and in addition he has another $1.2 billion in his corporate tax cuts and then hope that they pass that savings on. Most economists say they won't actually pass that savings on to families.

PFOTENHAUER: Jason, before you became Barack Obama's top economic advisor you supported a cut in the corporate tax rate because we had the second worst in the world and it's absolutely essential to lower that to at least the average rate from an international competitiveness standpoint. Your boss is the first protectionist president we've -- or nominee we've had in my lifetime, why, because it's lousy economic policy. You are raising some taxes. You have to admit that, and you're raising it on the job creators. You're also slamming small business with a healthcare mandate that could cost $12,000 per employee with a family.

BLITZER: All right. He says this is a standard republican line. The democrats, if they are elected to the white house, will simply raise your taxes. Go ahead.

FURMAN: I couldn't really see your clip there, but if he was speaking to an audience of CEO's, he was telling the truth. If he was speaking to an audience of middle class American families, he should have been telling them that his tax plan leaves out 101 million, this is John McCain. The ones lucky enough to get a tax cut would get $125. Barack Obama, 95 percent of workers and their families, tax cut, $1,000. The dispute in this race is not over whether you want to cut taxes. The dispute is who you want to cut them for.

Pfotenhauer Discusses Phil Gramm Comments, Says His Status on Campaign Has Not Changed (CNN, 11:50am)
WOLF BLITZER: Phil Gramm, the former senator from Texas, caused a huge stir this week, saying you've heard of mental depression, this is a mental recession. He went on to say that we have sort of become a nation of whiners. Senator McCain distanced himself and repudiated those words quickly. Is he still a top economic adviser to Senator McCain?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: I have heard about no change in status, but you certainly heard very loudly and clearly Senator McCain say that Phil Gramm does not speak for me in this regard. I've always said that Senator McCain has, in his own inimitable way, has always made it clear how he feels about something. And he said the person in Michigan who's lost their job because their plant closed down or he was laid off, this isn't psychological, this is real. So he went through the whole litany of examples of people he's met who are suffering.

BLITZER: What about for Senator McCain?

PFOTENHAUER: I don't think there's much disagreement here among the candidates. I think that certainly Senator McCain has said that we will not allow Fannie and Freddie to fail. That is just not an option. That you have millions of homeowners who are in their homes because of Fannie and Freddie. And that looking forward, that the dislocation to the economic markets here would just be too severe.

Schwarzenegger Admits to Not Believing McCain's Rhetoric on Campaign Trail and Aligning Often With Obama's Positions Over McCain's (ABC, 07/13/08, 10:15am)
ARNOLD SCHWARZENEGGER: Well this is why I love this guy. Because he has over and over shown that he can reach across the aisle. See, that is the important thing, John McCain, every time I talk to him, he's never stuck on just, I am a republican, and I'm going to force republican ideas. He wants to get things done. I have seen him do it. He just doesn't talk about it, he does it.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: Senator McCain is saying he wants to extend President Bush's economic policies, extend his tax cuts, expand his positions on health care. Extend free trade. Democrats are in very different positions on those issues.

SCHWARZENEGGER: Let me tell you something, what is being said on those presidential campaigns is one thing. But what people have done in the past is something else. So judge people of what have they done. Senator McCain has been in that office for long enough time to look at his record. And I think his record shows that he maybe has his ideas, but he sees also the democrats have their ideas. And he's interested in molding his ideas together with the democratic ideas in order to come up with a compromise.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Sounds like you're saying, don't listen to what he says on the campaign trail.

SCHWARZENEGGER: No, I said in general, you have to judge people more by what they have done in the past. I always say that, you know, better, well done is better than well said.

STEPHANOPOULOS: I have been looking through the issues. Look at issues on energy, on drilling. Senator Obama has basically taken your emissions plan as his model. On gay marriage, both you and senator Obama are against this initiative here in California, senator McCain is on the other side. Both you and Senator Obama, pro choice. Senator McCain on the other side. On Iraq, you're both for time lines, senator McCain on the other side. Health care, you're much more in line with senator Obama. It seems like, on so many issues you have more in common with Obama than McCain.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SCHWARZENEGGER: It appears like that maybe to you. For instance when you said the time line. I always made it very clear that I believe in the time line. But I said, also at the same time, we should never leave and just walk out the door.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You always thought there should be a time line.

SCHWARZENEGGER: And it could take years and time line means that we say ok, 20,000 come home at this time, 15,000 come home at this time. But I think that Senator McCain is absolutely correct, to be honest with the people, and to look at them in the eye and say, I cannot promise you that we will not have some troops in there in Iraq in many more years from now. it could be 100 years, he said that. And then he also said to people, he said look at what happened with Japan. How many years the war is over, 1945, Second World War is over, we still have troops in Japan. Germany the war has been over since 1945. We still have troops there. we have troops all over the world. it would be a lie to say we have no more troops there. He's just saying it the way it is. It's reality.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You're more with in line with McCain on Iraq than Obama?

SCHWARZENEGGER: I think we have to win over there, I think it's very important to stabilize the Middle East. I think that we also have to find a strategy to get out of there as quickly as possible. There's no two ways about it. Because I think that the Iraqis feel proud. They feel they can take care of themselves eventually and they can run their country by themselves.

STEPHANOPOULOS: their prime minister wants a time line now.

SCHWARZENEGGER: I think you can't let those things happen just from one minute to the next and with wars, I think it will be easy if we can be so on the dime with, you know, how we calculate those things and how we predict but there is no such thing. with wars, unexpected things that happen and so on. So I think America has done as a whole a great job over there. I think there were a lot of mistakes obviously made. But I think but now we have to do the follow-through.

Schwarzenegger Dismisses Offshore Drilling and McCain's Energy Policies as Unhelpful and a Farce (ABC, 7/13/08, 10:17am)
ARNOLD SCHWARZENEGGER: I have no interest in offshore drilling off the state of California. People can do it wherever they want. I think that's what McCain made clear, when he talked about it, that he will give the rights to the states. And he can give the rights to the states but we in California say thank you for giving us the rights, but, no, we have no interest in doing offshore drilling. Because we want to protect our coast.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: And that's more important than bringing down the price of gas, bringing down the price of oil.

SCHWARZENEGGER: First of all, let me just make it clear, anyone that tells you drilling, nuclear power, alternative fuels, fuel cells, solar, all of those things will bring down the price right now, I think is pulling wool over your eyes, because we know that all of those will take at least ten years. But that should not mean that we should not do those things, because here's the important thing. What's the biggest problem in America? It's not that we don't have any ideas; it's just that we are not consistent. That we have jimmy carter in the late '70s that came in with a great energy policy. Talking about shale oil explorations, giving tax credits for people starting to invest in windmills, solar and all of those things. Then president Reagan came in and scrapped the whole thing, because the oil price came down.

Contessa Brewer Discusses McCain Economic Week and the Effect Gramm had on it (MSNBC 07/13/08 10:15am)

JONATHAN ALLEN: ... John McCain wants voters to see a narrative where the Iraq war was a good idea, the Bush administration botched it, McCain came in with the surge strategy, the surge strategy worked and now US forces are being withdrawn. That is a lot of things to try and explain to voters in a short period of time ...

CONTESSA BREWER: The number one issue now is no longer Iraq, the number one issue to voters is the economy. It was a tough week for Senator McCain last week because his economic adviser Senator Phil Gramm had said to the Washington Times that the US is a nation of whiners and that we are in a mental recession

BREWER: Last week McCain had said something to the effect that we may be in a recession or we are moving toward a recession. Why all the emphasis on rather we are in a recession or not?

ALLEN: ... John McCain tried to roll out his economic proposals this week and Phil Gramm jumped all over those economic proposals preventing them from being rolled out...

BREWER: We know that Senator McCain is stumping in New Mexico and California in the next few days and he is going to speak before this big group in San Diego. Hes got this big ad out, this new ad in some key battleground states that basically says hey look lets not forget that these immigrants are gods children that even though we want them to get here legally, that immigrants have brought with them a lot of strength and character to the United States do you think that thats an issue that is going to necessarily secure the votes of Latino people who go to the polls in November?

ALLEN: I think it is imperative for Senator McCain if he wants to compete with Latino voters. It is unlikely that he will win a majority of them but he wants to do at least as well as President Bush did with Latino voters and maybe even better. It is imperative for him if he wants to do that...

Panel Discusses what McCain's Mismanagement of his Campaign says about a Future McCain Administration (NBC 07/13/08 10:20am)

CHRIS MATTHEWS: Its Déjà-vu last year at this time John McCain's campaign was in total disarray directionless and penniless but then he announced a big shakeup he kept on working and by February he had triumphed. Now McCain again finds his campaign described as stalled by constant infighting. His solution? Another staff shakeup and a new guy at the top. The New York Times reporter Adam Nagourney wrote this week quote "Even former McCain associates think voters now might be getting an early glimpse of the messy, unstructured way in which a McCain White House might be managed." Howard, is this a fair problem for people to worry about? Staff shake ups, firing people, layering people bringing in new bosses to run the campaign?

HOWARD FINEMAN: Well John McCain is not a systems thinker. He is a leader by personal will and by force of personality. And he has gathered a sort of constellation of people around him. Nobody ever actually leaves the orbit. It is just different planets fly closer at different times.

MATTHEWS: Who are these former staffers that keep dumping on him in the New York Times.

FINEMAN: There are a couple who had escaped gravitational pull. But they are still there. When he was a squadron commander, when McCain was a squadron commander down in Florida, he led by shear force of personality. When he left the whole thing fell apart again.

Gramm's role as "Architect" of McCain's Economic Plan Highlighted (NBC 07/13/08 11:45am) that we're in a mental recession. To Jackson's credit, he at least apologized. Barack accepted his apology and he went on to say it was silly what he said.

ANDREA MITCHELL: The difference Harold is that Gramm was the architect and adviser of the economic plan for John McCain. Jesse Jackson was a surrogate, you know an endorser, but never at all close.

FORD: I'm agreeing with you. I'm just making a point. Mike was making a point it probably was not as bad as for McCain.

Carly Fiorina on Meet the Press (NBC, 07/13/08, 10:30am)
TOM BROKAW: Welcome to the both of you as I don't need to tell you as this campaign is running at full octane seven days a week twenty four hours a day, the most explosive comments I think its fair to say Ms. Fiorina came this past week from Phil Gramm, a principle economic adviser to Senator McCain when he had this to say about what he says was the real state of the American economy.

GRAMM: "You've heard of mental depression; this is a mental recession. We may have a recession; we haven't had one yet. You just hear this constant whining, complaining about a loss of our competitiveness, America in decline. We've never been in a more dominant position; we've never had more natural advantages than we have today. We've sort of become a nation of whiners." Not surprisingly, Senator Obama had an immediate response to that and this is what he had to say to Senator Gramm's characterization.

OBAMA: "This economic downturn is not in your head. When people are out there losing their homes, and property values are declining, that's not a figment of your imagination." And at the same time, Senator McCain had this response to his friend Phil Gramm and economic adviser. MCCAIN: "I don't agree with Senator Gramm. I believe that the person here in Michigan that just lost his job isn't suffering from a mental recession. Phil Gramm does not speak for me. I speak for me. So, I strongly disagree." Ms. Fiorina, what is the status of Mr. Gramm in the campaign of Senator John McCain this morning?

CARLY FIORINA: Well, John McCain, after making the statement that you just played was asked directly whether Senator Gramm would have a position in his cabinet and his response was well perhaps he would make a good ambassador to Belarus but I'm not sure the citizens of Minsk would welcome him. I think John McCain's been real clear that Phil Gramm wasn't speaking for him. In fact Senator McCain has said now for many months that he believes the economy is in a recession. Its clear Americans are hurting. They're hurting when they fill up their car with gas. They're hurting when they go to the grocery store.

BROKAW: But the question is will Senator Gramm continue to have a role in the campaign. Will he be listed on the letterhead and will he be in which you discuss the economy?

FIORINA: I don't think Senator Gramm will be any longer speaking for John McCain and I think John McCain was crystal clear about that this week. And I think by the way, outside Washington where this is an interesting parlor game, I think most Americans are not really focused on what a bunch of surrogates are saying. They are focused on what the candidates are saying. I was on town hall meetings with John McCain all week. Not one question about Phil Gramm. Not one question.

BROKAW: Well, with all due respect, we have you here as surrogates and we hope that America is paying attention and what you have to say because the campaign is on a broad front. Let me just play for you what Senator McCain had to say on this broadcast earlier this year in January about the economy vis-à-vis terrorism when he was questioned by my dear friend the late Tim Russert.

MCCAIN: "I believe the that most Republicans' first priority is the threat of radical Islamic extremism. Now I know the concerns about the-"

RUSSERT: "More than the economy?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: "More than the economy at the end of the day. We'll get through this, the economy. We're going to restore the economy and many of the measures we're taking right now- although it's very difficult now- this transcendent challenge of radical Islamic extremism will be with us for the 21st century." So have the priorities changed in the McCain campaign from radical Islamic terrorism to the economy as the number one issue?

FIORINA: I think John McCain has also been very clear that the economy is struggling. That people are hurting and that he as President has a plan to get the economy growing again and to create jobs.

BROKAW: More important to him now?

FIORINA: But he believes as I think all Democrats believe as well that the first and most important priority of the Federal government is to protect its citizens. I think that's what he was talking about. It's also clear that government has a role in helping to create jobs and get the economy growing again and that's why John McCain spent all week talking about the economy. This week and-

BROKAW: But in January of this year he did not anticipate the economy would worsen as quickly as it has.

FIORINA: I don't think anybody expected it would worsen as quickly as it has. And in fact if you go back and look at the surveys of economists and what they predicted in terms of a recession, you would see the number of economists who thought we would be in a recession in January was materially lower than the number of economists that think we will have a recession today. So no one predicted the economy would worsen as quickly as it has. The facts are however that in April, John McCain also came out and said Americans are hurting and that's why he proposed relief from gas taxes which would create instant relief in Americans' pockets. That was way back in April. I think he's understood the economy as an important issue for some time now.

BROKAW: We're going to get you in a second Senator McCaskill. Both campaigns have had difficulty this past week with accusations of flip flopping. Let me begin with Ms. Fiorina, you said that your candidate, John McCain, is a man the American people understand that he walks the talk. But let me just share with you what I think could be a Democratic ad come this fall. The ad will begin: Oh really, after quoting you, here's a man who voted against the Bush tax cuts, now he wants to make them permanent. Here's a man that is worried about global warming, now he wants to give American motorists a gas tax holiday so they can drive even more during the summer months. Here's a man who called Phil Gramm a trusted economic adviser, had him on the bus and in pictures with him, now, he disowns him. Here is a man who said he wasn't really up to speed on the issue of whether birth control should be covered by health control policies and in fact he voted against it.

FIORINA: Well lets me start by saying, uh, Senator McCain at the time of the Bush tax cuts, proposed his own tax cuts, which would provide even more relief to the middle class. The principle reason that he voted against the Bush tax cuts is because they were not accompanied by fiscal restraint. And he said at the time that we would be growing our national deficit, which in fact, we did. Federal spending has increased by 60% over the last seven years. And, he believes government has to get his house in order. He also has said he would double the exemption for dependents from 3,500 to 7,000 dollars, that he would phase out the Alternative Minimum Tax. With all due respect to advisers, it was also Senator Barack Obama who disowned his own pastor of twenty years. So there are times when people must make clear their own positions vs. the positions of others. And Senator McCain did so in respect to Senator Gramm.

LAST NIGHT'S EVENING NEWS

ABC reported on Hillary Clinton's CNN interview, specifically her comments about Donald Trump's recent remarks about Mexican immigrants. NBC had a segment about the PGA canceling a golf tournament that was to be held at one of Trump's courses in response to his immigration comments. Trump officials claimed that contractors require documentation from workers. Serta, Macy's, Farouk, NBC, ESPN, PGA, Televisa, Univision, and NASCAR have withdrawn from Trump's business. Trump remains confident that these companies and industries pulling from him will not affect his businesses. CBS reported on Hillary Clinton's trip to Iowa, and stated that Bernie Sanders is closing in on Hillary Clinton, by doubling his support in Iowa since May. Sanders claims that he is surprised by how many supporters he is getting and has raised $15 million, but not nearly as much as Hillary Clinton.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton Courts Bigger Crowds in Return to Iowa // NYT // Amy Chozick – July 7, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton returned to one of the most liberal pockets of the state that shunned her in 2008, to speak at a public library packed with Iowans who ranged from those curious to see the former first lady to those committed to caucusing for her in next February's contest.

"I want people's lives to be better when I finish as your president than when I started," Mrs. Clinton told a crowd of roughly 350 people in remarks that ranged from foreign policy and economic issues to the drug epidemic and mental health.

The event marked the start of another phase in Mrs. Clinton's 2016 campaign in which she intends to speak to larger crowds and take more questions from voters in the early nominating states of Iowa and New Hampshire.

On Tuesday, Mrs. Clinton also sat down for an interview with CNN, her first with a national television outlet since she announced her candidacy official in April.

This liberal college town, home to the University of Iowa, that overwhelmingly favored Barack Obama and John Edwards in 2008 (she came in third statewide) could serve as a test of whether Mrs. Clinton's message resonates with the Democratic Party's base. Senator Bernie Sanders, a socialist who is also seeking the party's nomination, drew a crowd of 300 people at an event here in May.

In her speech, an animated Mrs. Clinton seemed to try to hit all the liberal notes, including combating climate change, giving women access to reproductive health care and celebrating the Supreme Court's recent decisions to legalize same sex marriage nationwide and uphold a key provision of Mr. Obama's health care overhaul.

"If a Republican is elected president, that will be the end of the Affordable Care Act," Mrs. Clinton said.

Her calls to make college more affordable played well in the almost all-white and largely female crowd. "How many of you had loans to go to higher education? I did, I did, so did Bill," Mrs. Clinton said. "I had like two jobs. He had like five. We were just working around the clock."

Despite pleas from liberal groups, Mrs. Clinton has not gone as far as Mr. Sanders, who said he would eliminate tuition at public colleges to reduce student debt.

Mrs. Clinton pushed for greater gun control measures, which contrasts her to Mr. Sanders, who has been one of the Democratic Party's most ardent defenders of Second Amendment rights. "Let's not be afraid of the gun lobby, which does not even really represent the majority of gun owners," she said.

After the event, Mrs. Clinton took questions from reporters. She called the collapse of the Greek economy a "tragedy" and called on European leaders to reach an agreement. And she declined to comment on a controversial provision of a nuclear agreement with Iran that would require the nation to disclose its previous nuclear experimentation, an issue that has divided the Obama Administration.

When asked about Mr. Sanders's surge in the polls, Mrs. Clinton said she always expected the race to be competitive. "It should be competitive. It's only the presidency of the United States we're talking about, so the more the better," she said.

After Iowa City, Mrs. Clinton headed to Ottumwa, Iowa, where she would talk to Iowans at a grassroots-organizing event. The campaign said it has already directly reached 16,000 Iowans and recruited at least one committed caucusgoer in each of the state's 1,682 precincts.

But Mrs. Clinton still has much to do in this state where voters expect to personally meet their candidates before participating in the famous caucuses, which take place Feb 1, 2016. Her lead over Mr. Sanders has narrowed in a recent poll — she still leads by double digits — and Iowans are clearly checking their options.

"I think I'm here out of curiosity more than anything else at this point," said Ashley Heffernen, 22, a recent graduate who waited in line with her boyfriend to hear Mrs. Clinton and hopefully ask a question about immigration. "I want t see all the candidates," Ms. Heffernen said.

Colleen Russo also waited in line outside the library. She supported Mr. Obama in 2008, but said she wanted to show her five-year-old granddaughter Viviana, who wore a pink dress and purple tiara, that a woman could be president. "She couldn't be more experienced," Ms. Russo said of Mrs. Clinton.

Jorge Guerra, 26, who stood next to the Ms. Russo and her grandchild, interjected: "Well, I'm glad you didn't bring her to see Michele Bachmann."

Mr. Guerra said part of what is holding him back from being all-in for Mrs. Clinton was her relationship to Wall Street and corporations. "It unnerves me," he said. "I want her to be as honest about and be as open as possible about a lot of these questions."

Ms. Russo agreed and said there were still things about Mrs. Clinton that gave her pause, but said Mrs. Clinton was most likely to win a general election. "I think she needs to be more exposed and talk to bigger groups, like Bernie does," she said, referring to Mr. Sanders. Mr. Guerra nodded. "She can't hide. Not someone like her."

Mrs. Clinton seemed acutely aware of how tough things may be for her in Iowa. After her remarks, she took questions from the audience. Dozens of hands went up.

"I'm gonna let you pick," she told the crowd. "Because I don't want to lose any potential caucusgoers."

Clinton steps up attacks on GOP presidential candidates in Iowa — but steers clear of knocking

her Democratic rivals // WaPo // Jose Del Real – July 7, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton escalated her criticism of her GOP presidential rivals during a campaign stop here in Iowa City on Tuesday, knocking the field of candidates on immigration reform, health care and LGBT issues while steering clear of directly attacking her Democratic primary rivals.

"How many people running on the Republican side try to demean immigrants, insult immigrants, cast aspersions on immigrants? They know as well as we know, we are not going to deport 11 or 12 million people living here," she told a crowd of about 250 attendees in a packed room at the Iowa City Public Library. "I hear the Republican candidates — and it's not even the most vitriolic — none of them any longer support a path to citizenship. All of them would basically consign immigrants to second-class status."

Clinton echoed those sentiments in an interview with CNN after the campaign event, in which she said the Republican field is on "a spectrum of hostility." During that interview she denounced controversial comments by GOP presidential candidate and real estate mogul Donald Trump about Mexican immigrants. She specifically criticized former Florida governor Jeb Bush for not supporting an immigration reform plan that would give immigrants a path to citizenship, a position he once said he favored.

The former secretary of state paired those comments with warnings that a Republican president in 2016 would roll back the Affordable Care Act and would continue fighting for same-sex marriage bans, which the Supreme Court recently ruled were unconstitutional. She told supporters at the event that those issues highlight why she believes the country needs a Democrat in the White House after President Obama leaves office.

"The Republicans want to turn the clock back. They are going to look for every way they can," she said. "Instead of saying marriage equality is the law of the land and now let's move on to the next part of the agenda, which is ending discrimination against LGBT folks, they are going to try to fight a rearguard action."

But even while she spoke critically and aggressively about the GOP presidential hopefuls, the presumed Democratic frontrunner avoided making swipes at her primary challengers — mostly pointedly, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who has received outsize attention from the left flank of the party and is drawing crowds at campaign events that reach into the thousands.

"This is going to be competitive. It should be competitive — it's only the presidency of the United States we're talking about," she joked during a question-and-answer session with reporters after the campaign event. She did not, however, directly answer the question: what she thought about Sanders's recent surge on the left.

Meanwhile, the campaign's months-long ramp-up in the four early voting states hit a new peak Tuesday when 20 additional field organizers joined the Clinton campaign's Iowa operation, where the campaign has already invested a large amount of resources in hopes of capturing a decisive win in the first-in-the-nation caucuses. That addition, as the Des Moines Register first reported and the Washington Post confirmed, means her team now includes an imposing 47 paid organizers — in Iowa alone.

"This continues from our assumption that this is a competitive caucus that needs a significant organization to earn every vote," said Clinton spokesperson Jesse Ferguson. "[W]e'll have to work for every vote."

Hillary Clinton: On immigration, the GOP is just like Donald Trump // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti – July 7, 2015

IOWA CITY, Iowa — Hillary Clinton believes Donald Trump should be thrown in the doghouse for his comments on immigration. And that the rest of the Republican party should be tossed in there with him.

In her first national TV interview since she launched her campaign, the Democratic front-runner seized on the real estate mogul's controversial comments on immigration (calling many Mexican immigrants "rapists" and "criminals") to shame the rest of the Republican presidential field.

"I'm very disappointed in those comments and I feel very bad and very disappointed with him and with the Republican Party for not responding immediately and saying, enough, stop it," Clinton said to CNN after headlining an organizing meeting in a local public library.

"But they are all in the — you know, in the same general area on immigration. They don't want to provide a path to citizenship. They range across a spectrum of being either grudgingly welcome or hostile toward immigrants."

Clinton has already publicly bashed Trump for his comments, through not by name, after having previously accepted campaign contributions from him and even attending one of his weddings.

But on Tuesday, she played into fears the Republican establishment has about Trump dragging down the rest of the party with his inflammatory comments.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She also took aim at former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who has been more supportive of immigration reform than his rivals.

“He doesn’t believe in a path to citizenship. If he did at one time, he no longer does,” Clinton said. “And so pretty much they’re — as I said, they’re on a spectrum of, you know, hostility, which I think is really regrettable in a nation of immigrants like ours.”

Clinton touched on the email controversy that has bogged down the early days of her campaign, as well, saying she did not violate any rules by using a private email server while serving as secretary of state.

“Let’s take a deep breath here. Everything I did was permitted by law and regulation,” she said.

And, she added, there’s an upshot — the public now gets a glimpse into her daily life, from telling aide John Podesta to wear socks, to her struggles with operating a fax machine.

“Now I think it’s kind of fun. People get a real-time behind-the-scenes look at what I was emailing about and what I was communicating about,” she said.

The interview, with Brianna Keilar, touched on a broad range of topics — from Clinton’s doppelganger on “Saturday Night Live” to her plans for an economic policy speech in Kansas City on Monday to Democratic rival and surging candidate Bernie Sanders (“I always thought this would be a competitive race.”)

Clinton also answered a question about the brouhaha around a woman possibly bumping Alexander Hamilton off the $10 bill. Clinton’s not crazy about a compromise in which a woman might share the bill with Hamilton.

“That sounds pretty second class to me. So I think a woman should have her own bill,” she said.

The airing of the interview followed a full day in Iowa, during which the front-runner appeared looser-than-usual on the campaign trail.

Nearly three months into what could be the political fight of her life, Clinton noted on Tuesday that her time to ride off into the sunset is not all that far away.

“This is my last rodeo,” Clinton said during a campaign stop in the first-in-the-nation voting state on Tuesday afternoon before taking questions from reporters. Clinton said she wants to play a role in setting the country on the right path before hanging up her hat — but hopefully, she said, not until 2025, after eight years in the Oval Office.

“I believe that we can leave not just the country in good shape for the future, but we can get a deep bench of young people to decide they want to go into politics to continue the fights that we’re going to be waging,” she said.

The rodeo characterization may have been more apt than she intended. Her campaign has been criticized in recent days for using a rope to corral reporters who were following Clinton during a parade over the July 4th weekend. Greeting reporters after an organizing meeting at the Iowa City Public Library, Clinton nodded to the minicontroversy, looking at the barrier between her and the press and asking if it was the equivalent of a rope holding them back.

“I think it should come down,” she deadpanned.

She also glanced upon a range of issues in the news.

“Let’s not be afraid of the gun lobby, which does not even really represent the majority of gun owners in America,” Clinton told the crowd of more than 350 locals. While she refused to take the bait and attack Sanders when prompted, she has recently been speaking more about gun control — an issue on which she differs from Sanders, who hails from gun-friendly Vermont.

Clinton also focused on the dangers of climate change more than she usually does, calling it “one of the most existential threats to our country and our world.” And she again said that “if a Republican is elected president, that will be the end of the Affordable Care Act.”

Hillary Clinton 'disappointed' in Donald Trump

At times musing on her career as secretary of state, Clinton at one point said that she jokes with former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger about the difficulties of conducting diplomacy in the modern era.

But she refused to weigh in forcefully on the ongoing negotiations over Iran’s nuclear program, telling reporters,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I don't think it's useful for me to publicly comment right now on what the negotiations are attempting to resolve.

"There needs to be full transparency, disclosure and verifiable inspections going forward, and certainly any part of the Iranian nuclear or military establishment that has anything to do with the program past, present and future needs to be subject to that," she added.

Nonetheless, the former top diplomat did call the economic situation in Greece a "tragedy," insisting that it is important "that we can see an outcome here that will actually help Greece recover and keep them in the eurozone, and keep Europe united."

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Hillary Clinton Opens a Previously Guarded Door // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 7, 2015

Mrs. Clinton is about to give her first national close-up in her second presidential campaign.

She has been a candidate for almost three months. In that time, she's done a few news conferences and a smattering of local interviews in early states, but no national sit-downs.

But this afternoon, she will sit with the CNN reporter Brianna Keilar in Iowa. The interview comes as Mrs. Clinton has faced increasing criticism for avoiding questions on policy (the trade deal supported by President Obama but opposed by many Democrats) and on personal issues (her use of a private email account at the State Department and the fund-raising practices of her family's foundation).

Mrs. Clinton's aides said that her early focus was on interacting with as many voters as possible in small settings and that this national interview would be the first of several.

Much of the early campaign was about allowing Mrs. Clinton to exist in a safe political space, bringing one of the world's most famous political faces back down to earth from her days as secretary of state so that voters could forge a bond with her. But over the weekend, a half-dozen protesters created an unpredictable environment for Mrs. Clinton as she marched in a parade in northern New Hampshire. At the same time, her aides sought to give her a buffer so that voters could see her, separating journalists with a rope, creating a series of viral photos that ricocheted through Twitter.

The challenges that the Clinton campaign, and the candidate, face are unique. But while her political problems may be complex, the solution that her team seems to have settled on, at this point, is fairly simple: Open the doors to the news media a bit wider.

Hillary Clinton relied heavily on white voters in 2008. In 2016, it's reversed. // WaPo // Philip Bump – July 7, 2015

There are a lot of reasons that Hillary Clinton lost in 2008. One of the most prominent was that she was running against one of the most dynamic candidates in recent memory at a time when people were eager for something new. Another was that the dynamic candidate she was running against was black.

The latter became more of a problem over the long term, as Obama racked up primary victories in states with large black populations in the Deep South and cut into Clinton's dominance elsewhere. In Iowa and New Hampshire, two of the whitest states in the union, it played less of a role.

But now, weirdly, the whiteness of those early states might be something of a problem for her. And she's actually doing better among non-whites.

The CNN/ORC poll released last week reinforced that Clinton is doing much better in 2016 than any of her opponents -- especially among non-white voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She leads among white voters, too, of course -- and handily. But her lead over Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) among white voters is 34 points and appears to be narrowing. Among non-white voters -- which we will emphasize also includes Latinos -- it's 52 points.

If Sanders keeps closing the gap with white voters, that could be a problem in Iowa and New Hampshire. Clinton's big lead among non-white voters won't be much of an advantage until South Carolina -- which, incidentally, she lost by a wide margin in 2008.
One question mark: What becomes of the support for Joe Biden if he finally decides not to run? In CNN's polling, Biden ate up one-fifth of the non-white support. If that support goes to Clinton, the dynamic above becomes even more stark.

Remember, there is no reason at this point to think that Hillary Clinton will not be the Democratic nominee. There is not much of a reason to think that she will lose Iowa, and there's only a speculative idea that she might lose New Hampshire.

But those two states might end up being much closer than we might once have expected in part because they are awfully white -- a fact that might have been one reason Clinton won New Hampshire in 2008 and was able to stay in the race.

Hillary Clinton: Republican candidates 'on a spectrum of hostility' toward immigrants // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton says that Republican presidential candidates "range across a spectrum of hostility" when it comes to immigration and that her campaign will advocate for comprehensive reforms.

Sitting on Tuesday for her first national television interview as a declared presidential candidate, the Democratic frontrunner lumped together all GOP candidates when asked by CNN about Donald Trump's recent comments about Mexican immigrants. Interviewer Briana Keilar asked Clinton what she made of Trump's comments, noting that he had been a donor to some of her previous campaigns.

"I'm very disappointed in those comments and I feel very bad and very disappointed with him and with the Republican Party for not responding immediately and saying 'Enough, stop it,' " she said. "But they are all in the same general area on immigration. They don't want to provide a path to citizenship. They range across a spectrum of being either grudgingly welcome or hostile toward immigrants. And I'm going to talk about comprehensive immigration reform. I'm going to talk about all the good, law-abiding, productive members of the immigrant community that I personally know, that I've met over the course of my life. That I would like to see have a path to citizenship."

Clinton added that no Republican candidate supports establishing a system that would allow eligible illegal immigrants to eventually apply for citizenship. But Keilar noted that Bush has previously supported such a system.

Clinton shot back: "He doesn't believe in a path to citizenship. If he did at one time, he no longer does."

She added that Republicans are "on a spectrum of hostility, which I think is really regrettable in a nation of immigrants like ours. All the way to kind of grudging acceptance but refusal to go with a pathway to citizenship. I think that's a mistake."

In his 2013 book "Immigration Wars," Bush laid out a specific set of criteria that illegal immigrants — adults and children — would need to meet to apply for legal status and in limited circumstances, perhaps citizenship. He has more recently suggested that citizenship could be extended only as part of a bipartisan agreement that included changes in U.S.-Mexico border security, a reduction in immigrants allowed to enter the country due to family ties and an increase in the number allowed to enter the United States for economic purposes.

Bush's campaign responded to Clinton's comments just moments after they aired, noting that she voted for amendments that stopped immigration reform when she was a senator and that she said last year that unaccompanied minors crossing the U.S.-Mexico border "should be sent back."

"She is now running further to the left on immigration policy than even President Obama's White House believes is legally feasible," Bush spokeswoman Emily Benavides said in a statement. "Hillary Clinton will say anything to get elected and her numerous flip-flops on immigration prove it."

Benavides added that as he wrote in his book, Bush "believes in a conservative legislative solution to fix our broken immigration system that includes earned legal status for those currently in the country after they pay fines and taxes, learn English, and commit no substantial crimes while securing our border."

In the CNN interview, Clinton sounded similar to Bush when expressing general views on immigration — that the United States will never be able to deport the 11 million to 12 million people believed to be in the country illegally, and that a revamped immigration system would spur economic growth and increase tax revenues.

"We know we're not going to deport 11 or 12 million people. We shouldn't be breaking up families," she said. "We shouldn't be stopping people from having the opportunity to be fully integrated legally within our country. It's good for us, it's good economically, it's good for the taxes that will be legally collected. It's good for the children so that they can go as far as their hard work and talent will take them. So I am 100 percent behind comprehensive immigration reform that includes a path to citizenship."

Another GOP presidential candidate, Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.), co-authored the bipartisan comprehensive immigration reform bill that passed the Senate in 2013, and remains an advocate for allowing eligible immigrants to apply for citizenship.

Clinton made similar charges against GOP candidates to a wider group of reporters just before taping the CNN interview in Iowa City.

"How many people running on the Republican side try to demean immigrants, insult immigrants, cast aspersions on immigrants? They know as well as we know, we are not going to deport 11 or 12 million people living here," she told reporters.

"I hear the Republican candidates — and it's not even the most vitriolic — none of them any longer support a path to citizenship. All of them would basically consign immigrants to second-class status."

Keilar also asked Clinton about the possibility that she might face Bush in the general election.

"Well, we'll see, that's up to first the Republicans on his side and the Democrats on my side," she said. "What's great about America is anyone can run for president. That's literally true. And you have to go out and do what everybody else does ... you have to work really hard. So whoever is nominated by their respective parties will be the nominee, and then we'll see who's on the other side."

Hillary Clinton Blames 'Constant Barrage of Attacks' by GOP for Polls Questioning Her Honesty // WSJ // Laura Meckler – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Tuesday blamed voter perceptions that she is untrustworthy on a "constant barrage of attacks" by Republicans over many years, and said she's confident she will overcome them during the course of the 2016 presidential campaign.

Some of those attacks have focused on her exclusive use of a private email account for official business as secretary of state. In an interview with CNN, Clinton repeated her assertion that she had complied with rules in place at the time. Mrs. Clinton added that said she went "above and beyond" those standards by submitting her emails to the State Department, though rules in place did require her to preserve the records.

In her first national television interview, and before that in a brief news conference with reporters in Iowa, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination hedged as much as she revealed. She declined to say whether she supports raising taxes on the wealthy, said it was best for her to withhold comment on the Iran nuclear negotiations, and dodged a question about which woman's image should be on the $10 bill. She also declined to discuss the rise of the long-shot campaign of rival Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont.

She said she is "very disappointed" by the disparaging remarks Republican candidate and entrepreneur Donald Trump uttered last month about Mexican immigrants, calling them "rapists," and denounced the GOP presidential field for opposing a path to citizenship for people in the U.S. illegally.

"They are all in the same general area on immigration," she said. "They don't want to provide a path to citizenship. They range across the spectrum of being either grudgingly welcome or hostile toward immigrants."

Mrs. Clinton also criticized the city of San Francisco for failing to facilitate the deportation of a repeat felon who had been kicked out of the U.S. five times before and who earlier this month killed a woman walking on a city pier. "The city made a mistake not to deport someone that the federal government thought should be deported," she said.

Some recent polls have found a drop in the number of voters who see Mrs. Clinton as honest and trustworthy. Asked about that by CNN, Mrs. Clinton said that was to be expected "when you are subjected to the kind of constant barrage of attacks that are largely fomented by and coming from the right."

"This has been a theme that has been used against me and my husband for many, many years," she said. She said that entire books were filled with "unsubstantiated allegations" so "of course that's going to raise questions in people's minds."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A recent book suggested conflicts of interest between foreign donations to the Clinton family foundation and her work as secretary of state, though it failed to reveal evidence of a quid pro quo.

“I have every confidence during the course of this campaign people are going to know who will fight for them and be there for them,” she said. “At the end of the day, I think voters sort it out.”

On the question of her email practices, she said that everything she did was permitted by law in place at the time. “There was no law. There was no regulation. There was nothing that did not give me the full authority to decide how I was going to communicate,” she said.

She dismissed concerns expressed by Republicans about her decision to delete emails that she and her aides determined to be unrelated to government work. “I turned over everything I was obligated to turn over and then I moved on,” she said. “People delete on a regular basis.”

She said that her decision to turn over the government-related emails to the State Department, which requested them last year, was “above and beyond” what was required. In fact, in 2009, the National Archives and Records Administration issued regulations that said agencies allowing employees to do official business on unofficial email accounts had to ensure that any records sent on private email systems are preserved “in the appropriate agency record-keeping system.”

The making of a Hillary Clinton echo chamber // WaPo // Philip Rucker – July 7, 2015

One day in May, operatives from a Washington-based super PAC gathered New Hampshire mayors, state representatives and local politicos at St. Anselm College for a day of training.

They rehearsed their personal tales of how they met Hillary Rodham Clinton and why they support her for president. They sharpened their defenses of her record as secretary of state. They scripted their arguments for why the Democratic front-runner has been “a lifetime champion of income opportunity.” And they polished their on-camera presentations in a series of mock interviews.

The objective of the sessions: to nurture a seemingly grass roots echo chamber of Clinton supporters reading from the same script across the communities that dot New Hampshire, a critical state that hosts the nation’s first presidential primary.

The super PAC, called Correct the Record, convened similar talking-point tutorials and media-training classes in May and June in three other early voting states — Iowa, South Carolina and Nevada — as well as sessions earlier this spring in California.

Presidential campaigns have for decades fed talking points to surrogates who appear on national television or introduce candidates on the stump. But the effort to script and train local supporters is unusually ambitious and illustrates the extent to which the Clinton campaign and its web of sanctioned, allied super PACs are leaving nothing to chance.

When, say, a Londonderry Times reporter calls a Rockingham County Democratic Committee member for comment on Clinton, he or she will parrot Correct the Record’s talking points about Clinton having been a fighter for the middle class — from improving rural health care as first lady of Arkansas to raising the minimum wage as a senator from New York.

“We are holding sessions with top communicators across the country where we talk about the best ways to discuss Secretary Clinton’s strong record of accomplishments, how to articulate Secretary Clinton’s positions most effectively and how to correct Republican operatives’ distortions of the facts,” said Adrienne Watson, communications director at Correct the Record.

But asking local supporters to use talking points could undermine the organic nature of grass-roots political interactions. No longer can a journalist call up a state representative in Iowa and expect to hear his or her personal, unvarnished take on Clinton — nor can a Rotary Club member watch a fellow small-business owner talk about Clinton at their monthly luncheon — without suspecting he or she is reading from a script.

The super PAC’s effort also comes as Clinton struggles on the campaign trail to appear accessible and genuine. Some Democrats have long believed Clinton sounds too scripted on the stump, especially compared to Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), her insurgent primary rival whose authenticity and liberal message are drawing thousands of Democrats to his rallies.

New Hampshire state Sen. Lou D’Allesandro, a local elected official for decades and a longtime Clinton supporter, said he did not attend Correct the Record’s session, which was held May 18 at the New Hampshire Institute of Politics at St. Anselm.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I’ve known Hillary for a long time,” D’Allesandro said. “I’ve known her husband for a long time. She’s been at our home. I’ve visited her in Washington. I believe that I can articulate where she is on issues and I really don’t need anybody to tell me what to say. I believe that you stand for people because you believe what they stand for and you articulate it.”

Correct the Record — one of several super PACs run by Clinton ally David Brock — coordinates some of its activities with Clinton’s campaign, but officials said the campaign played no role in the training sessions.

The Clinton campaign has its own surrogate operation that distributes talking points to supporters to ensure that their messages in local and national media are consistent.

The super PAC’s on-camera media training was conducted by the Franklin Forum and led by the group’s president, John Neffinger, a Democratic strategist who specializes in coaching people for television interviews.

Correct the Record held a series of similar media sessions in the spring of 2014 to prepare Clinton backers for interviews surrounding her national book tour for “Hard Choices,” the memoir from her State Department years.

Watson said the super PAC plans to hold additional campaign-oriented training sessions later this year.

To supporters like Eleni Kounalakis, who served as ambassador to Hungary in Clinton’s State Department, the program is welcome news. In March, she participated along with about 20 other supporters in a Correct the Record session in San Francisco and said she thought it helped her and other Clinton fans refine the case they make for Clinton’s candidacy in public.

“Many people who are very vocal in supporting Secretary Clinton are very comfortable taking about why among their friends and in small groups — but when it comes to talking to the media, that can be very intimidating,” Kounalakis said. “Some people feel like, I know Hillary has been there for the working person in her life, in her career, but I want someone to help me prepare those arguments so that I have that confidence to speak in a broader context.”

Nick Sottile, 21, president of the College Democrats of South Carolina, said he felt “lucky” to attend a May 7 Correct the Record session in Columbia, S.C.

“It got right to the heart of things — how to cut through the noise and talk about Secretary Clinton’s record,” Sottile said. “And not just what to say, but how to talk about her as a young person in South Carolina. It was good training in how to be an effective talker.”

Lawmakers: Feds Should Have Deported Undocumented Immigrant Before SF Pier Shooting // AP – July 7, 2015

Lawmakers and politicians are criticizing the failure to deport an immigrant with multiple felony convictions and an outstanding drug warrant who allegedly went on to murder a woman in San Francisco.

Presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton, in an interview with CNN, said that the City of San Francisco's law enforcement officials were wrong to release from jail Mexican national Francisco Sanchez, who is now at the center of a national immigration controversy.

"The city made a mistake, not to deport someone that the federal government strongly felt should be deported," Clinton said. "So I have absolutely no support for a city that ignores the strong evidence that should be acted on."

The Sheriff's Department ignored "strong evidence" that Sanchez should have been turned over to immigration officials and deported, according to Clinton.

In a similar vein, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) issued a statement Tuesday saying that she has personally been investigating the circumstances surrounding Kathryn Steinle's fatal shooting July 1.

“I strongly believe that an undocumented individual, convicted of multiple felonies and with a detainer request from ICE, should not have been released," she said. "We should focus on deporting convicted criminals, not setting them loose on our streets."

Feinstein also wrote to San Francisco Mayor Ed Lee to express her "deep concern" about Sanchez's release, adding that it "led to last week’s tragic death." Her letter "urged" Lee to "prevent such a tragedy" from reoccurring by joining the Department of Homeland Security's Priority Enforcement Program, which would enable local law enforcement agencies to "provide notice to ICE before releasing aliens with long criminal records."
The San Francisco mayor's office said it has reached out to Department of Homeland Security officials to determine if there's a way to cooperate with federal immigration officials while still maintaining the sanctuary policy.

"Mayor Lee shares the senator's concerns surrounding the nature of Mr. Sanchez' transfer to San Francisco and release," said Christine Falvey, a spokeswoman for the mayor. "As the mayor has stated, we need to gather all of the facts as we develop potential solutions."

Democratic Sen. Barbara Boxer, also from Northern California, said she asked Gov. Jerry Brown if state law was followed in the release of Sanchez.

"For decades, I have supported deporting violent criminals, and I have always believed that sanctuary should not be given to felons," Boxer said.

Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis) echoed the same sentiment.

"He had a criminal warrant but was released into the general society to commit a murder. Does that make any sense to you?" Johnson, who chairs the Senate's homeland security committee, demanded to know at a hearing. "Because I'll tell you it doesn't make any sense to the American public."

Philip Miller, an official with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, blamed San Francisco, saying officials there did not honor a federal request, known as a "detainer," to keep Francisco Sanchez in custody.

Sanchez, who is from Mexico and is in the United States illegally, allegedly shot and killed 32-year-old Kathryn Steinle last week as she was sightseeing with her father along a popular local pier.

"In that particular case our detainer was not honored," Miller said. "San Francisco sheriff's department did not honor our detainer."

San Francisco Sheriff Ross Mirkarimi has defended his office's decision, saying ICE should have issued an arrest warrant earlier. Miller declined after the hearing to comment on that assertion. But Virginia Kice, a spokeswoman for ICE told NBC Bay Area this week that "obtaining judicial warrants is not only unnecessary, it would place an immense burden on both ICE and the federal courts." She added that last year, ICE deported more than 177,000 immigrants with criminal convictions.

Steinle's death has offered ammunition to GOP critics of Obama administration policies, including presidential candidate Donald Trump, who's cited it to justify his claims that many immigrants are criminals. Sanchez has a long criminal history, but mostly for drug use, dating back to the 1990s, federal records show.

At the same time it plays into a larger, politically charged immigration debate between federal authorities and local jurisdictions.

Hundreds of local jurisdictions have refused to participate in a disputed federal program, Secure Communities, that allows local authorities to turn over information on immigrants they pick up to the federal government. San Francisco takes it farther than many, even boasting of itself as a ``sanctuary city'' that protects immigrants.

President Barack Obama announced last fall he was ending the Secure Communities program and replacing it with a new approach meant to address concerns about immigrants being targeted.

But that has sparked more criticism from Republicans who embraced Secure Communities as an effective law enforcement tool and oppose Obama's attempts to change immigration law through executive actions without Congress' consent.

House Judiciary Chairman Bob Goodlatte, R-Va., announced Tuesday he would bring Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson before his committee next week to answer questions on the matter.

"Just recently, we were reminded that the Obama administration's reckless actions, such as permitting sanctuary city policies, lead to tragic and deadly consequences," Goodlatte said.

Hillary Clinton Hands Jeb Bush A Present On Immigration // HuffPo // Igor Bobic – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton denounced Donald Trump's controversial comments about immigrants in her first national interview as a 2016 presidential candidate. But in the process, she inadvertently handed Republican rival Jeb Bush a present on a silver platter.

The Democratic front-runner told CNN's Brianna Keilar Tuesday that she was "very disappointed" with the celebrity hotelier for calling some Mexican migrants rapists and criminals. She criticized the rest of the 2016 Republican presidential candidates for not moving quickly enough to distance themselves from Trump and noted their opposition to comprehensive immigration reform.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He doesn't believe in a path to citizenship. If he did at one time, he no longer does," she said of Bush, the former governor of Florida.

The broadside could hurt Bush among Hispanic voters if Clinton succeeds in portraying him as opposed to immigration reform. It's a smart, long-term play against a well-funded Republican with a decent chance of winning the nomination.

For the moment, however, Bush faces more immediate challenges as he traverses early primary states. Chief among them is his effort to win over conservatives who believe that he supports granting undocumented immigrants "amnesty." In fact, Bush says that undocumented workers should be able to earn legal status, “not necessarily citizenship.” Clinton, however, says that anything short of a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants is "code for second-class status."

Immigration remains one of the most divisive topics among Republicans in the early caucus state of Iowa, but there are still far more who oppose a path to citizenship than support it. According to a Quinnipiac University poll released Monday, 46 percent of likely Republican caucus goers in Iowa said undocumented immigrants should be required to leave the country, while 34 percent said they should be allowed to stay with some sort of path to citizenship.

Any reminder that Bush opposes "amnesty" is good news in Iowa -- regardless of whether it comes from the candidate or his potential Democratic rival.

Hillary Clinton Piles On San Francisco Officials, Putting Sanctuary Cities Under Even More Heat / / HuffPo // Elise Foley – July 7, 2015

After a deadly shooting in San Francisco, allegedly by a man who had been deported five times, lawmakers are calling on the county to drop its policy against cooperating with immigration enforcement.

Presidential candidate Hillary Clinton became the most high-profile Democrat to wade into the debate on Tuesday, telling CNN that San Francisco should have worked with agents at Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

"The city made a mistake, not to deport someone that the federal government strongly felt should be deported," she said in an interview. "So I have absolutely no support for a city that ignores the strong evidence that should be acted on."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), meanwhile, sent a letter on Tuesday to San Francisco Mayor Ed Lee urging him to cooperate with ICE, implying the county's failure to do so allowed for the shooting of 32-year-old Kathryn Steinle, allegedly at the hands of a previously deported undocumented immigrant named Francisco Sanchez.

GOP lawmakers, who are more prone to support a greater federal thumbprint on detention policy, have decried San Francisco leaders for acting irresponsibly. One of them, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), said he plans to introduce a bill penalizing cities that do not cooperate with ICE.

With the debate around immigration already red hot due to the charged rhetoric of the 2016 campaign, the incident in San Francisco could end up prompting a shift in recent trends in detention policy. For years, local communities have been limiting their collaboration with immigration enforcement officials, with more than 300 cities and counties adopting policies against fully complying with ICE's requests. Some, like San Francisco, barely deal with the agency at all, while others limit interactions except in cases of more serious crimes.

The widespread resistance led the Obama administration to announce in November that it would drop the Secure Communities program, which asked police to hold individuals for ICE so they could be picked up for deportation purposes.

The immediate fallout from the shooting in San Francisco appears to be a change in those particular political winds.

But the debate remains a sensitive one, with activists and even local officials warning that a greater federal role could harm other law enforcement activities, drain resources and spark court challenges.

At issue is whether local law enforcement, at the request of ICE, should -- or even legally could -- hold individuals who it otherwise would have released. Immigration advocates have warned that doing so creates fear in the undocumented community and sweeps up people for deportation because of low-level crimes or arrests they are never convicted for.

To accommodate those concerns, the administration is pushing a new policy called the Priority Enforcement

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Program, which was announced last November. Under PEP, according to the administration, ICE would target individuals at higher priority for deportation, such as convicted criminals. The program also will ask local law enforcement to notify the agency when it plans to release a suspected deportable immigrant, rather than for holds.

That program hasn't been rolled out nationwide, and an ICE official said their appeals to San Francisco officials to work with them haven't gone anywhere. But critics are charging that had ICE implemented PEP in San Francisco sooner, Sanchez, who said he shot Steinle last Wednesday before saying on Tuesday that he was not guilty, would not have been released into the community.

Prior to the shooting, Sanchez had been deported five times and had seven felony convictions, according to authorities. Twice, ICE put in detainer requests for him. The first was with the Bureau of Prisons, where he was serving a sentence for the federal crime of illegally re-entering the U.S. as a felon. Sanchez was transferred by the Bureau of Prisons to the San Francisco sheriff's office because he had an arrest warrant for a 20-year-old marijuana case. ICE then put in a request to the sheriff's office to detain him. After the district attorney declined to prosecute that charge, he was released in April.

Officials at the San Francisco County Sheriff's Office and ICE have since blamed each other for that release, with the local authorities saying ICE should have gotten a judicial warrant if they wanted Sanchez to be held, and ICE claiming it was never notified that the man was about to be let go.

With the debate expanding beyond the particulars of what happened and into the realm of public policy, critics of Secure Communities worry the tragedy in San Francisco will be used as a cudgel against cities that have tried to move their police departments out of the immigration enforcement business. They warn there are not just humanitarian and budget constraints to consider, but constitutional complications as well.

"I've seen this happen over and over again where anti-immigrant groups try to use these types of horrible cases to change policies but there are constitutional protections, and people cannot be held for immigration without a judge signing a warrant," said Angela Chan, a policy director at the Asian Law Caucus.

Police chiefs could be an ally in pushing back against greater federal involvement in local immigration matters. Many have contended that they need to strike a balance between acting as enforcement agents and performing their duties to protect the public. Montgomery County Police Chief J. Thomas Manger, also the president of the Major Cities Chiefs Association, said doing too much of the former risks hurting the relationship law enforcement has with the broader community.

Montgomery County officials announced last year that immigrants would no longer be held for ICE without demonstration that the individual likely committed a crime. Manger approves of PEP and said his office notifies ICE when individuals are being released upon request. But the fact that individuals are released and go on to commit crime is a risk in all law enforcement, he insisted, and not just specific to immigration.

"I've been a cop for 38 years," he said. "And for longer than I've been a cop, [criminals] have been getting out of jail and doing bad things again. The fact is that the law allows you to hold someone for a certain amount of time and when the law says you've got to release them, you've got to release them.

Clinton says GOP field ranges from 'grudgingly welcome' to 'hostile' toward immigrants // AP //
Catherine Lucey & Ken Thomas – July 7, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton said a Republican in the White House would mark a "big U-turn" for the nation and assailed the GOP presidential field's stance on an immigration overhaul.

Asked about Jeb Bush, the Democratic presidential candidate said: "He doesn't believe in a path to citizenship. If he did at one time, he no longer does."

In an interview Tuesday with CNN, Clinton said the Republican presidential contenders range "across a spectrum of being either grudgingly welcome or hostile toward immigrants."

Campaigning in one of the most liberal pockets of Iowa, Clinton offered herself up as a Democratic standard-bearer at a time when her main Democratic rival, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has generated big crowds and stoked interest among progressives. Clinton also addressed criticism that she has avoided scrutiny, taking questions from reporters and then sitting down for her first national television interview since starting her campaign.

Clinton cited her husband's eight years in office as a time of strong economic growth that helped not only the wealthy but the poor as well. She said Republicans afterward left President Barack Obama to tend to an economic crisis.

"Right now our country deserves to keep moving forward, not to do a big U-turn going back to where we came from," Clinton said at the Iowa City Public Library. "That didn't work before. It won't work again."

She told CNN she planned to outline some of her economic policies Monday.

Clinton has said any immigration legislation needs to include a path to "full and equal citizenship." She has defended Obama's use of executive actions to shield millions of immigrants living in the U.S. illegally from deportation.

In the interview, Clinton said she was "disappointed" in Republican candidate Donald Trump for his disparaging comments about Mexican immigrants along "with the Republican Party for not responding immediately and saying, 'Enough, stop it.'"

Clinton demurred in discussing the possibility of another Bush-Clinton campaign — Bill Clinton defeated President George H.W. Bush in 1992 — but lumped former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush in with other Republicans who have opposed immigration overhauls in Congress.

Bush, in his 2013 book "Immigration Wars," called for a process that would allow people living in the U.S. illegally to remain, as long as they take a series of steps. He wrote that withholding citizenship is a suitable penalty for those who have broken the law. Bush's co-author, Clint Bolick, said the former Florida governor would probably bend to support citizenship, if that was necessary to strike a deal on immigration.

Bush spokeswoman Emily Benavides said in a statement that Bush "believes in a conservative legislative solution to fix our broken immigration system that includes earned legal status for those currently in the country after they pay fines and taxes, learn English and commit no substantial crimes while securing our border."

During the CNN interview, Clinton defended her decision to delete some of her emails as secretary of state from her private email server, saying, "Everything I did was permitted by law and regulation." She said she used one device for email, although an email message obtained by The Associated Press earlier this year showed Clinton used an iPad for email, in addition to her BlackBerry, while she was secretary of state.

Rep. Trey Gowdy, chairman of the House Select Committee on Benghazi, responded Tuesday, saying "the committee does not know why or when she chose to wipe clean her personal server, but we do know her way of doing things provided an incomplete public record." The committee sought Clinton's emails as part of its investigation into the 2012 attack on the U.S. diplomatic post in Benghazi, Libya.

At her Iowa event, Clinton made no mention of Sanders but drew an implicit contrast with his record on gun control. Sanders, a favorite of liberal Democrats, has opposed some gun control measures in the Senate and drew criticism from some Democrats for voting in 2005 to protect gun manufacturers from lawsuits filed by victims of gun violence.

Clinton said she would speak out "about the uncontrollable use of guns in our country" and believes most Americans and gun owners support universal background checks. "Let's not be afraid of the gun lobby, which does not even really represent the majority of gun owners in America," she said.

Sanders says most gun owners in the country obey the law, and he makes a distinction on the gun-control question between rural states like Vermont, where hunting is common and gun-ownership traditions go deep, and big cities.

"I want to see real, serious debate and action on guns, but it is not going to take place if we simply have extreme positions on both sides," he told CNN on Sunday. "I think I can bring us to the middle."

Asked about Sanders, Clinton said she welcomed a contested race. "This is going to be competitive — it should be competitive," Clinton said.

Hillary confronts the enemy // Politico // Annie Karni & Gabrielle Debenedetti – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign, unlike those of her rivals, has provided the media with information about the fundraisers attended by the former secretary of state, down to the names of the donors who hosted and the head count for each event. Its communications shop has so far maintained a constructive working relationship with the press corps — senior staffers last month mingled with reporters over beers after a background briefing at the Brooklyn campaign headquarters.

That new spirit of openness may have neutralized the famously toxic relationship between the press and the Clinton operation, but with Bernie Sanders turning out huge crowds and the Republicans about to steal the spotlight next month with their first debate, Clinton operatives have realized it's time to cross the final, harrowing frontier: providing access to the candidate herself.

For the first three months of her campaign, Clinton remained virtually off-limits to the national press. She did not sit down for a national television interview (her most recent occurred during her book tour for “Hard Choices” in 2014), nor did she grant any interviews to national newspapers or websites. With questions surrounding her use of private email during her years at the State Department, and surrounding the Clinton Foundation, the candidate herself remained as distant from the national media as ever — and it shows in the press coverage of her second presidential bid.

On Tuesday, after a campaign stop in New Hampshire, the campaign sought to enter a new phase of its relations with the press — Clinton sat with CNN’s Brianna Keilar (notably a beat reporter, not one of the network’s anchors who are household names) for her first nationally broadcast interview.

More interviews will follow, communications director Jennifer Palmieri has promised.

Clinton insiders said July makes sense for Hillary’s moment to finally embrace national television — enough time has passed since the height of the controversies surrounding the Clinton Foundation and her use of a private email address at the State Department that she will have space to talk about her own campaign message.

But the campaign doesn’t have the luxury of waiting much longer: In August, Clinton is scheduled to go on vacation, and then the crowded Republican field will be chewing up news cycles with the first debate — possibly defining Clinton on a national stage.

“Now is a good time for the campaign to take back control of the story of who Hillary Clinton is,” said longtime donor Jay Jacobs. “She can now use [national television] to accomplish that.” In terms of the controversies she will have to respond to, he said, “The tide has been turned.” Beginning Monday, Clinton will also start rolling out more detailed policy proposals to discuss.

Until now, Clinton has favored the confines of local media outlets. Since her Roosevelt Island rally in early June, she has participated in interviews only in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

For a candidate with effectively 100 percent name recognition in the country, national media interviews have been low on the priority list. During the “ramp-up” period of her campaign, which lasted two months, Clinton answered only a handful of questions from reporters, mostly yelled at her from a large gaggle. Instead, she spent time asking the questions at roundtable events in the early voting states.

Some of that is par for the course in a primary. “It’s important to do some national press, but your time should be heavily weighed towards the places where people vote first,” said Tommy Vietor, a former Obama campaign spokesman.

But even the favored local press has begun to note — and chafe at — the lack of access. “High-horse Hillary corrals a wimpy news media,” blared the headline of a front-page editorial in Manchester, New Hampshire’s influential Union-Leader newspaper, after reporters were corralled with a rope during a July 4 parade in Gorham, New Hampshire.

Ironically, it was the “high-horse” image that the campaign has tried to avoid by steering clear of the national news networks and focusing instead on “everyday Americans.”

But on Sunday, Palmieri conceded to Fox News’ Howard Kurtz that “we’re paying a price” for not participating in sit-down interviews on national television and that the inevitable pivot to more engagement would start now.

The tipping point may have come over the weekend in New Hampshire, where the awkwardness of the situation came to a head. Clinton answered four questions from a group of pool reporters while waiting for a scoop at the Daily Twirl ice cream stand. The following day, reporters were awkwardly corralled away from Clinton by a rope line as she marched in a small July 4 parade in Gorham. Afterward, while speaking to locals at a diner, she refused to answer any questions, even a softball about Donald Trump.

“You know, I’m gonna sit down and have some pie,” she smiled, before the gaggle of press was ushered out, leaving the rope-line incident to take on greater significance because there was no other news to report on.

The next phase of the campaign’s media strategy, as unveiled Tuesday, seems designed to avoid a similar situation. “The more media interviews you do,” Palmieri explained to Kurtz, “the less any one interaction matters.”

Yet judging from Clinton’s CNN interview, it’s not quite clear the candidate has bought in — while she sat down for questions, she didn’t really open up. Asked by CNN why she decided to sit for an interview, and whether anything has changed when it comes to her approach to the media, the famously press-averse candidate had a ready answer.

“Well, nothing’s really changed,” she said. “I just have a different rhythm to my campaign. I’m not running my campaign for the press. I’m running it for voters. I totally respect the press and what the press has to do. But I wanted and was determined to have the time that I needed to actually meet and listen to people."

Hillary Clinton plans meeting with black lawmakers // Politico // Lauren French – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton will meet with members of the Congressional Black Caucus next week.
The 2016 front-runner for the Democratic nomination will travel to Capitol Hill to hold a members-only meeting Tuesday with the nearly 50 lawmakers in the black caucus. The meeting is expected to focus on policy issues, according to sources familiar with the agenda.

"Members of the Congressional Black Caucus are invited to a policy meeting with Former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. The meeting will be an overview on pressing foreign and domestic policy issues impacting the African American Community," according to an email sent by the Clinton campaign.

The black vote will be critical for Clinton in 2016. Democrats will need strong support from African-Americans to push their party over the finish line in key congressional races and during the general election. Meanwhile, the GOP is also actively courting black voters.

The Tuesday meeting will be one of the first that Clinton has held with the CBC since declaring her candidacy earlier this year. Earlier, top officials with the former secretary of state's campaign traveled to D.C. shortly after she announced her presidential bid as a way to introduce Clinton's campaign team to Democrats on the Hill.

Hillary Clinton not amused by fax machine mockery // Politico // Adam Lerner – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton may not be the world's most "technically capable person," she admitted in an interview with CNN that aired Tuesday.

But she won't stand for media mockery suggesting she can't work a simple fax machine.

In the interview, CNN's Brianna Keilar mentioned that recently released emails show that Clinton's longtime aide Huma Abedin had to instruct her boss on how to work her fax machine.

"Can you hang up the fax line, they will call again and try fax," Abedin wrote in one widely shared email exchange.

"I thought it was supposed to be off hook to work?" Clinton responded.

Abedin told her: "Just pick up phone and hang it up. And leave it hung up."

"I've done it twice now," Clinton responded, before giving up. "Still nothing."

In Tuesday's interview, Clinton interrupted Keilar before she could formulate a question.

"Yes, a secure fax machine, which is harder to work than the regular," the Democratic 2016 front-runner said.

She then went on to say that the issue of her email server "is being blown up with no basis in law or in fact. That's fine. I get it. This is being, in effect, used by the Republicans in the Congress, OK."

"But I want people to understand what the truth is," she continued. "And the truth is everything I did was permitted and I went above and beyond what anybody could have expected in making sure that if the State Department didn't capture something, I made a real effort to get it to them. And I had no obligation to do any of that."

The interview touched on another subject relevant to the political theater surrounding the nascent 2016 presidential campaign: Saturday Night Live impressions.

Asked whether Kate McKinnon or Amy Poehler did a better impression of her, Clinton gave the political answer.

"Amy's a friend of mine. And Kate's doing a great job. You're not going to get me to pick one or the other," she said, adding, "I think I'm the best Hillary Clinton, to be honest."

A defensive Clinton promises 'more press' // Politico // Dylan Byers – July 7, 2015

The first national interview of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign did not go well. She dodged questions about Bernie Sanders' appeal, refused to say whether she would seek to raise taxes, dismissed data showing that the majority of Americans' don't trust her, and was repeatedly forced to defend her lack of transparency at both the State Department and the Clinton Foundation.

And yet, toward the interview's conclusion, the long-evasive Democratic front-runner pledged to do more uncomfortable sit-downs like the one she had just, painstakingly, endured.

"Obviously 'll be doing a lot more press," Clinton told CNN's Brianna Keilar.

The only reason Clinton hadn't been doing national interviews, she said, was because she had been busy listening to American voters.

"I just have a different rhythm to my campaign. I'm not running my campaign for the press, I'm running it for the voters," she explained. "I totally respect the press and what the press has to do. I wanted and was determined to have the time that I needed to actually meet and listen to people. I had not been involved in domestic politics while I was Secretary of State, and I just wanted to get my own feel, my own time, face to face with people."

"Everything has its own time and I'm on my own rhythm," she said.

While that may be true, avoiding the press had become a dominant theme of Clinton's early days on the campaign trail. Clinton said she'd always planned "to spend the first 90 days... getting my feel of what was going on in the country," but her refusal to answer questions from reporters on the trail was so frequent that it made headlines.

As Clinton told Keiler, "it'll be 90 days [since the launch of her campaign] on Sunday," and the time to open up to the media has come. But if Americans are expecting more transparency from Clinton, they may be sorely disappointed.

"I didn't hear a more open or transparent Hillary Clinton," Keilar said after her interview. "I heard her not engaging on the issue of Bernie Sanders. He's a self-described Democratic socialist. I asked her why is he garnering this support, this enthusiasm, that you don't seem to among Democrats. She wouldn't engage on that. Even on this concern of if she were to face off against Jeb Bush, and there would be this dynastic race between a Bush and a Clinton... she wouldn't engage on that. She was very quick to move on."

Keilar bears some responsibility for that, of course. She hardly pressed Clinton to answer the questions she was dodging and rushed from topic to topic. If an interviewer is hoping to pin Clinton down on anything, she or he will probably have to take a more Terry Gross-like approach.

More likely, however, is that Clinton herself will decide to be more transparent. There are almost 500 days left till election day; if she is serious about "doing a lot more press," she'll need to come up with a better strategy than "dodge and defend."

Clinton says Puerto Rico should have access to U.S. bankruptcy laws // Reuters // Amanda Becker – June 30, 2015

U.S. Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton said Tuesday that Puerto Rico's public entities should be able to use U.S. bankruptcy laws to restructure some $72 billion in debt.

Like U.S. states, Puerto Rico, a commonwealth, cannot file for bankruptcy protection. Unlike U.S. states, Puerto Rico's public entities, including municipalities, are not covered by U.S. Chapter 9 bankruptcy laws.

Puerto Rico's non-voting delegate in the U.S. Congress has called for legislation that would allow Puerto Rico to access the same bankruptcy laws available to other municipalities, as has Puerto Rico's Governor Alejandro Garcia Padilla.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit late Monday affirmed a lower court decision to strike down Puerto Rican legislation aimed at granting local municipalities the right to enter bankruptcy, but said excluding the U.S. territory's public entities from federal bankruptcy law was unconstitutional.

"Congress and the Obama administration need to partner with Puerto Rico by providing real support and tools so that Puerto Rico can do the hard work it will take to get on a path toward stability and prosperity," Clinton said in a statement provided to Reuters.

"As a first step, Congress should provide Puerto Rico the same authority that states already have to enable severely distressed government entities, including municipalities and public corporations, to restructure their debts under Chapter 9 of the Bankruptcy Code," Clinton added.

The White House said last week that there is "no one in the administration" that is "contemplating a federal bailout of Puerto Rico" but that the U.S. Congress should "take a look at" whether Puerto Rico's government-owned corporations should be able to access Chapter 9 bankruptcy protection.

Congressional Republicans largely oppose such a step. Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush said in April that he thinks Puerto Rico's public agencies should have the ability to use U.S. bankruptcy laws.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We're not talking about a bailout, we're talking about a fair shot at success," Clinton said Tuesday.

Clinton said in the statement that the "inconsistent and incoherent" application of U.S. federal law to Puerto Rico contributed to its economic situation, noting high utility rates and unemployment have led to an economy that has shrunk for eight of the last nine years.

"One troubling example of this treatment is the lack of equity in federal funding for Puerto Rico under Medicaid and Medicare," Clinton said of health insurance programs sponsored by the U.S. government.

Clinton, also a former first lady, is the front runner for the Democratic nomination ahead of the general election in November 2016.

Meme says Hillary Clinton's top donors are banks and corporations, Bernie Sanders' are labor unions // Politifact // Louis Jacobson – July 7, 2015

As Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders gains ground on Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton, the two candidates' supporters have been sparring, including over campaign donations.

Recently, a reader sent us a social media meme that paints Clinton's list of donors as dominated by corporate interests, whereas Sanders' top 10 donors come largely from labor unions -- a dichotomy that, to Democratic primary voters, puts Sanders in a more favorable light.

"Hillary: Top ten donor list. Representing banks, corporations and media," the meme reads, providing a top-10 list with dollar amounts. "Bernie: Top ten donor list. Representing people." The meme is topped by each candidate's presidential campaign logo. (See the meme below.)

We can't tell who produced this meme, but we thought it was worth a closer look.

We'll start by noting that reasonable people can disagree about whether labor unions represent "people," as the meme says, as opposed to just unionized workers, who are a relatively small subset of the entire population. We'll also note that while this meme may appeal to union supporters and critics of Wall Street and big corporations, it also could be used as evidence that Sanders is just as reliant on one type of donor -- labor unions -- as Clinton is on big corporations.

We found that the data cited in the meme refers to cumulative donations over the course of each candidate's political career as calculated by the Center for Responsive Politics, not just fundraising from the current presidential cycle. (Clinton and Sanders have announced their fundraising hauls for the second quarter of 2015, but have not yet released the full data that is due at the Federal Election Commission by July 15; a more complete analysis of the data will be compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics after that.)

For Clinton, we found a high degree of similarity with the meme when we checked the database on July 6.

Clinton's top 10 cumulative donors between between 1999 and 2016 were, in descending order, Citigroup ($782,327), Goldman Sachs ($711,490), DLA Piper ($628,030), JPMorgan Chase ($620,919), EMILY's List ($605,174) Morgan Stanley ($543,065), Time Warner ($411,296), Skadden Arps ($406,640), Lehman Brothers ($362,853) and Cablevision Systems ($336,288).

That list is quite close to what the meme says. It includes five financial-services companies, two law firms that do a lot of corporate work, two media conglomerates and one group, EMILY's list, that supports abortion-rights Democratic candidates. It's worth noting that Clinton was a senator from New York, meaning that some of the donors on her list were not simply Wall Street and corporate behemoths, but also constituents, based in New York.

The database results for Sanders are also quite close to what's in the meme. The data for Sanders goes back to 1989.

His top 10 are, in descending order, Machinists/Aerospace Workers union ($105,000), Teamsters union ($93,700), National Education Association ($84,350), United Auto Workers ($79,650), United Food & Commercial Workers union ($72,500), Communications Workers of America ($68,000), Laborers Union ($64,000), Carpenters & Joiners Union ($62,000), National Association of Letter Carriers ($61,000), and the American Association for Justice ($60,500).

In the meme, the letter carriers' union makes the list, but the Center for Responsive Politics has the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees cracking the top 10 instead. Either way, nine of the 10 are unions, and the tenth is the national association representing plaintiffs' attorneys. During his career, Sanders has received strong support from progressive Democrats, so this pattern of financial backing is not surprising.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So the meme is pretty accurate for both candidates. However, we see a few things worth pointing out.

As we noted, this data refers to their entire political careers back to the 1990s. Once the full presidential data is released, those figures may show different patterns. "That is not made clear" in the meme, said Anthony J. Corrado, a campaign-finance expert at Colby College. "Most people would assume that this is money raised so far in the 2016 presidential campaign."

Also, the "donors" listed are not the ones who gave the money, since that would be against the law. Rather, it was their PACs, employees and those employees' families. In fact, due to how the forms are filled out, the data is less likely to capture individual donations from union members than from employers of companies. Most individual donations are listed by employer, and if, say, a union carpenter lists his affiliation as his company, the fact that he's a union member wouldn't be recorded.

Finally, lists such as this ignore that both candidates are collecting many small donations, too. According to the Clinton campaign, she raised roughly $50 million in contributions under $200 during her '08 campaign. Data for the 2016 cycle is not available yet.

All told, it's possible to look at the top donors on the two lists and say both candidates are captive to a particular set of interest groups, said Kyle Kondik, managing editor of Sabato's Crystal Ball at the University of Virginia Center for Politics. However, he added, "labor is a Democratic constituency whose beliefs generally line up with Democratic policies, and we're talking about a Democratic primary here. So all things being equal, Sanders' donor list probably looks better, politically, than Clinton's."

Kondik added that, as the meme indicates, Clinton has a much larger reservoir of money than Sanders has. "The value of having a large financial advantage over your competitors in a primary setting seems to be worth occasional questions about how the financial advantage was built," he said.

Our ruling

Social media memes say that Clinton's top 10 donors are mainly "banks, corporations and media," while Bernie Sanders' top 10 donors are labor unions. This contention fits quite closely with campaign data from the Center for Responsive Politics. However, it's worth noting that this data refers to cumulative donations as far back as the 1980s, rather than just donations to their current presidential bids. The statement is accurate but needs clarification, so we rate it Mostly True.

Clinton vows to make 'comprehensive' im migration reform cornerstone issue // Radio Iowa // Kay Henderson – July 7, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton spoke to a packed room in the Iowa City Public Library this afternoon, accusing Republicans of proposing a "U-turn" for the country and promising as president she would push for "comprehensive" immigration reform.

"A lot of our people who are working hard here are people who have earned the right to stay and we have to change our system to take advantage of their contributions," Clinton said.

Clinton said there's no way to deport up to 12 million undocumented immigrants and Clinton used the word "sad" to describe how Republican presidential candidates are addressing the issue.

"We've always prided ourselves on being a nation of immigrants…and then I hear, you know, the Republican candidates — and it's not only, you know, the ones that are most vitriolic — none of them support a path to citizenship," Clinton said. "All of them would basically consign immigrants to second-class status."

Clinton did not directly mention Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump's remarks about Mexicans which have caused controversy, but Clinton, in general, accused Republicans of engaging in a "destructive" debate on immigration.

"And let's face the fact we need comprehensive immigration reform," Clinton said. "I don't care how many people running for president on the Republican side try to demean immigrants, insult immigrants, cast aspersions on immigrants."

During her speech to the crowd, Clinton mentioned the case of a popular Iowa City pastor who was recently deported and someone in the crowd asked her about the case, too. Clinton pledged as president she would deport criminals, but she'd urge prosecutors to use discretion in similar cases.

About 350 people made it into the library to see and hear Clinton, while about 100 more gathered on the sidewalk outside waiting for the chance to shake Clinton's hand as she left. Clinton held a news conference inside the library after the event, joking with her staff that they should remove the "rope" behind which reporters and photographers were assembled. It was a reference to the image of Clinton's press team using a rope to corral reporters following Clinton in a New Hampshire parade. Clinton's staff removed the barrier and the questioning began.

Clinton emails may revive environmental group's lawsuit // The Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood – July 7, 2015

An environmental group whose request for records related to the Keystone Pipeline was reportedly hampered while Hillary Clinton served as secretary of state is considering taking the case to court for the second time.

Ben Schreiber, climate and energy program director at Friends of the Earth, said his group has weighed the option of relitigation in the weeks since learning that Clinton's chief of staff, Cheryl Mills, had interfered in the agency's handling of Freedom of Information Act requests for Keystone documents.

While Schreiber said Friends of the Earth received a number of emails involving Clinton's top aides when the original case settled during Clinton's tenure, he noted the State Department did not then have any of the secretary's emails to produce.

"For us, this is very much a good governance thing," Schreiber said. "It's pretty clear that at the highest levels of the State Department while Hillary Clinton was secretary of state, the agency did everything in their power to undermine the integrity of the Freedom of Information Act, and that for us is troubling."

The discovery that Clinton has now submitted thousands of emails to the agency that could prove responsive to Friends of the Earth's 2010 request means the group could potentially force a different outcome if it sued the State Department a second time.

The request sought any communications between State Department staff and Paul Elliott, a lobbyist for TransCanada and former Clinton campaign aide. TransCanada is the company that would build the Keystone Pipeline if the project received the necessary government approval.

Schreiber pointed to a Wall Street Journal article published in May that suggested Mills began screening documents set for release under FOIA after Friends of the Earth obtained an email that illustrated the cozy relationship between Elliott and State staffers.

"The Keystone documents Ms. Mills objected to were all either held back or redacted," the Journal report said. "After Ms. Mills began scrutinizing documents, the State Department's disclosure of records related to Keystone fell off sharply, documents that include a court filing show."

Friends of the Earth did obtain hundreds of emails sent between top State Department officials and Elliott in 2011 through the lawsuit, however.

Those emails reveal Clinton's staff was indeed concerned about how the agency responded to FOIA requests.

For example Alexander Yuan, a State Department official, forwarded a news article to staff that reported the agency's decision to comply with the Friends of the Earth FOIA request for records concerning Elliott.

"Interesting how we at State learn about these decisions," Yuan wrote of the Feb. 18, 2011 article. Yuan also suggested sending a state official to speak with the FOIA office in person.

The exchange suggests State Department staff may have felt they had sway over how the agency responded to FOIA requests.

In another email exchange from May 2011, a different State official raised concerns that the agency had received more inquiries about "the Secretary's relationship with TransCanada lobbyist Paul Elliott and the FOIA."

Aides circulated "press guidance" about how to deal with questions about Elliott's ties to Clinton and the high-profile project he was advocating.

Schreiber noted the decision to revisit the lawsuit was still a matter of discussion, citing the cost of litigation as a concern, but said the new information about Mills' meddling with FOIA requests prompted Friends of the Earth to begin considering reopening the case.

Hillary On San Francisco Illegal Immigrant Murder: 'The City Made A Mistake' // The Daily Caller // Al Weaver – July 7, 2015

In her first national television interview, Hillary Clinton said that San Francisco "made a mistake" by not deporting Francisco Sanchez, the illegal immigrant that murdered Kate Steinle last week and had been deported five times.

Clinton told CNN's Brianna Keilar that she has "absolutely no support for a city" that does not act when they disregard evidence "that should be acted upon," though she did not respond to Keilar's point that she supported sanctuary cities during her initial presidential run in 2008.

BRIANNA KEILAR: Last week an undocumented immigrant who had been deported five times killed a 32-year-old, Kate Steinle, in San Francisco — a sanctuary city where local law enforcement does not enforce federal immigration laws. When you last ran for president, you supported sanctuary cities. In light of this terrible incident, does that change anything about your view on this?

HILLARY CLINTON: Well, what should be done is any city should listen to the Department of Homeland Security, which as I understand it, urged them to deport this man again after he got out of prison another time. Here's a case where we've deported, we've deported, we've deported, he ends back up in our country, and I think the city made a mistake. The city made a mistake not to deport someone that the federal government strongly felt should be deported. So I have absolutely no support for a city that ignores the strong evidence that should be acted on. However, there are — if it were the first time traffic citation many, if it were something minor — a misdemeanor, that's entirely different. This man had already been deported five times, and he should have been deported at the request of the federal government.

Three questions for Hillary Clinton // The Washington Examiner // Byron York – July 7, 2015

After months of refusing to answer questions, avoiding situations in which she might be questioned, and literally roping off the press, Hillary Clinton has granted an interview to a news organization. CNN's Brianna Keilar, who will do the interview, has asked for suggestions on what she might ask. Here are three questions for the former secretary of state:

1) In March, you said, 'I ... provided all my emails that could possibly be work-related' to the State Department. Now, State says there are some emails you didn't turn over. Did you tell the truth in March?

2) After turning over some of your emails to the State Department, you destroyed everything: all emails, all backups. Why?

3) On Aug. 16, 2012, Ambassador Chris Stevens warned State of dangerous security problems in Benghazi, Libya, saying U.S. facilities there could not survive a 'coordinated attack.' Top administration officials Leon Panetta and Martin Dempsey testified that they knew about the Stevens warning. You said you were too busy to see it. Why?

Committed, undecided line up to see Clinton in Iowa City // The Gazette // James Lynch – July 7, 2015

She's a former first lady, U.S. senator, secretary of state and now a formidable candidate for president.

But Hillary Clinton's visit to the Iowa City Public Library was news to many people hurrying to work or simply taking a walk through the downtown Ped Mall Tuesday morning.

"What are all these people doing?" Joe Daringer of Iowa City asked, pointing to a line of people waiting to get into the library nearly two hours before what the Clinton campaign described as a "organizing event,"

"Here?" Daringer said when told the people — a couple of hundred strong at that point — were waiting to see the leading candidate for the 2016 Democratic nomination for president. "At the library? Of all places. How are they going to get them in there?"

The Clinton campaign squeezed about 250 of her supporters into the library's meeting rooms and with more in an overflow area.

Daringer, who said he leans toward Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, wasn't impressed.

"When Obama was here he was over on the Pentacrest, and there were thousands of people," he said.

The Koepnick family of Iowa City wasn't concerned about the size of the venue. Tina Koepnick said she backed Clinton eight years ago and she's committed to backing her this time.

"I'm looking for someone who is smart, articulate and a good leader — and that's Hillary," Tina Koepnick said as she waited in line with her husband Keven, and their daughter, Emily, around the corner from the library.

"I've been ready to vote for Hillary for a while," Kevin added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Emily, a University of Iowa student, is eager to cast her first vote in a presidential election for Clinton, who she has admired for a long time.

“She’s a strong female who’s done great things for the country,” Emily Koepnick said.

Clinton has a “great track record” and “talks about the right things in the right way,” added Sue Zaleski of Solon who could see the library from her spot in the line that wound down the Ped Mall.

Change could reduce time Iowa patients wait for prescriptions

Iowa labor leaders call for unions to endorse Sanders

However, first-time voter Bruce James, who was just in front of Zaleski, wasn’t so sure.

“I’m keeping my ears open,” James said. That includes listening to Sanders. He likes what Sanders has to say about the economy and taxing the rich.

“I need to hear her speak,” he said about Clinton, “and then I’ll make up my mind.”

Loretta Ross drove in from Topeka because she has “great respect” for Clinton, but like James, she’s listening to Sanders, too.

“I’m weighing the established foundation Hillary brings — her experience and the breadth of her experience — with Sanders’ very clear goals in areas that are important to me,” Ross said.

At the moment, Ross added, she thinks Clinton has more general election appeal.

Hillary Clinton rips GOP on immigration: She says their problem is much bigger than Trump // Salon // Sophia Tesfaye – July 7, 2015

During her first nationally televised interview of her 2016 campaign, Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton said the possibility of another a Bush v. Clinton election a quarter century after her husband’s first presidential election is a coincidence in an America in which “anybody can run for president.”

CNN’s Brianna Keilar also asked Clinton about Republican candidate Donald Trump’s recent comments equating Mexican immigrants to “rapists.” Keilar noted that Trump had previously donated to the Clinton Foundation but that didn’t stop Clinton from railing against Trump, saying “I’m very disappointed in those comments and I feel very bad and very disappointed with him.”

But Clinton was quick to pivot from Trump to the entire Republican field, telling Keilar that she was also disappointed “with the Republican Party for not responding immediately and saying enough, stop it. But they are all in the, you know, in the same general area on immigration,” she said. “They range across a spectrum of being either grudgingly welcome or hostile towards immigrants.”

Clinton singled out Jeb Bush specifically, noting, “He doesn’t believe in a path to citizenship. If he did at one time, he no longer does.” And distinguishing herself from the GOP field, Clinton said, ““I am 100% behind comprehensive immigration reform that includes a path to citizenship.”

But not all Republican candidates oppose comprehensive immigration reform that includes a pathway to citizenship. South Carolina Senator Lindsey Graham, a long shot hopeful, was quick to remind CNN’s Maeve Reston that he, in fact, has been a long time supporter of a pathway to citizenship.

And as for those pesky emails? Clinton dismissed the affair as the latest in a long saga of Republican investigations into the Clintons. “This is being blown up with no basis in law or in fact. That’s fine, I get it — this is being, in effect, used by the Republicans in the Congress. OK,” Clinton said. “But I want people to understand what the truth is, and the truth is, everything I did was permitted and I went above and beyond what was expected.”

Keilar delved into other areas of controversy for Clinton, asking if she would consider shutting down the Clinton Foundation if she were to win the White House. Clinton defended the nonprofit’s work as “critical,” saying, “I have no plans to say or do anything about the Clinton foundation other than to say I am proud of it and I think for the good of the world, its work should continue.”

Clinton surmised much of the foundation’s success stemmed from the work of her husband, saying, “maybe it’s because it’s because my husband knows so many people in the world and he is so creative and he is so smart but he was able to put together solutions to problems wether it was HIV/AIDS or childhood obesity in our country or expanding farm productivity in Africa that was hard for other to do.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And Clinton, who supported so-called “sanctuary cities” during her last presidential run, was forceful in her criticism of San Francisco for ignoring immigration detention requests from the federal government. An undocumented immigrant who had been deported multiple times was arrested in the recent killing of a young woman, and Donald Trump has used the murder to bolster his argument that Mexican immigrants are criminals. “The city made a mistake not to deport someone that the federal government thought should be deported ... I have absolutely no support for a city that ignores the strong evidence that should be acted on,” Clinton said, but she made clear that such scrutiny would not be required for minor or misdemeanor charges.

Clinton also weighed in on the debate over adding a woman to the 10 dollar bill, saying “it may be more appropriate to look at the 20 than the 10.”

Hillary Clinton: GOP on 'Spectrum of Hostility' Towards Immigrants // NBC News // Carrie Dann – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Tuesday said that the GOP 2016 field is on "a spectrum of hostility" towards immigrants, accusing Republicans of failing to condemn Donald Trump immediately for his controversial comments about Mexicans.

Clinton told CNN in an interview that she is "very disappointed" in Trump's remarks, adding that the Republicans seeking the White House are "all in the same general area on immigration."

"They range across a spectrum of being either grudgingly welcome or hostile towards immigrants," she said, adding that none - including Jeb Bush - back a pathway to citizenship for the undocumented population.

"If he did at one time, he no longer does," she said of the former Florida governor's stance on creating such a pathway.

The 2016 Democratic frontrunner emphasized that she is "100% behind comprehensive immigration reform that includes a path to citizenship."

"I think that we know we're not going to deport 11 or 12 million people," she added. "We shouldn't be breaking up families. We shouldn't be stopping people from having the opportunity to be fully integrated legally within our country."

The interview was Clinton's first sit-down with a national television network since declaring her candidacy. More of the interview is slated to air this afternoon on CNN.

Hillary Clinton on Her 'Last Rodeo' // The National Journal // Emma Roller – July 7, 2015

Before Hillary Clinton spoke to a crowd of roughly 250 supporters in the Iowa City Public Library on Tuesday, a young female campaign staffer had a few requests for the attendees. First, she asked those in attendance to pull out their smartphones and "like" Clinton's local Facebook page for Iowa and Johnson County. Then, she rattled off a phone number for the supporters to text in exchange for "updates" (aka donation pleas) from the campaign, which announced that it added 20 field organizers to its already large Iowa staff Tuesday.

But the actual content of Clinton's speech was refreshingly free of campaign artifice. Yes, she began with her routine spiel about income inequality, health care, and her excitement at becoming a grandmother, but her remarks felt more off-the-cuff than usual. Perhaps in an attempt to embrace her inner nerd, Clinton recalled spending hours in her local library during summer vacations while growing up.

One anecdote from her career as secretary of State in particular stood out as something new not only to the attendees, but to the reporters who obsessively cover the Clinton campaign as well. She told a story about the 2009 United Nations Climate Change Conference in Copenhagen, Denmark. Clinton and President Obama were trying to negotiate terms with India and China—two of the fastest-developing countries in the world—for a climate change agreement.

The problem: China and India's leaders were nowhere to be found. Clinton said she and Obama "sent out scouts," who found that the leaders were meeting in a clandestine conference room. Clinton and Obama marched to the room, she said, and pushed past Chinese security guards to confront the heads of state. As a result, the assembled countries signed an accord outlining emissions pledges and other goals for energy use, though much of the text was nonbinding.

"We would not be in as strong a position if the president had not pursued everything from auto emissions to utility controls," Clinton added on Tuesday.

Aside from climate change, Clinton gradually began filling in some of the details of her economic and social agenda. And she opened up a little more on Democratic politics and her own future.

The economy and immigration:

Clinton blamed Republican presidents for the recent economic crises in the U.S., and said that trickle-down economics needs to be "buried six feet under."

"There seems to be a pattern here, and we cannot afford to go back to the failed economic policies of the past," she said. "We have to be committed to electing a Democrat who will build on what works with actual evidence ... so that we build shared prosperity that everybody benefits from."

On income inequality and immigration reform, there is a yawning chasm between Republicans and Democrats, especially in Iowa. A recent Quinnipiac University poll found that 70 percent of likely Republican caucus voters say the government should not pursue policies to reduce income inequality, while 91 percent of their Democratic counterparts said the government should pursue such policies.

The same poll found that 46 percent of Iowa Republicans say undocumented immigrants living in the U.S. should be required to leave, while 83 percent of Democrats said the immigrants should be given a path to citizenship.

Clinton called the Republican discourse on immigration a "very stale, destructive debate."

"I don't care how many people running for president on the Republican side try to demean immigrants, insult immigrants, cast aspersions on immigrants," Clinton said. "We are not going to deport 11 or 12 million people."

After calling out her Republican opponents for opposing a path to citizenship—some of them in fits and starts—Clinton said some illegal immigrants "have earned the right to stay." She mentioned one such immigrant by name: Max Villatoro, an Iowa pastor who was deported in March.

Clinton said that, if elected president, she would start by returning to the bipartisan immigration bill that passed the Senate in 2010 but stalled out in the House.

"That would be my starting point. You voted for it once. Let's vote for it again."

Education:

Clinton stressed public education, especially the need to improve the government's Head Start early childhood program and to implement universal pre-kindergarten.

"If we do not have early childhood education, we will never get the results for the vast majority of our children as we could," she said. "If we don't tackle 0 to 5, we're going to lose out."

Health care:

She asked the crowd if they were "thrilled" about the Supreme Court upholding the Affordable Care Act, but warned that the liberal success could easily unravel come 2017.

"If a Republican is elected president, that will be the end of the Affordable Care Act," she said. "We have to succeed President Obama with a Democrat, to protect, defend, and fix the Affordable Care Act."

Contraception:

"If we provide family planning services, more young women have a chance to finish their education before they become parents," she said.

Abortion:

"I will always defend a woman's right to choose," she said. "That is something that should no longer be debatable."

Campaign finance:

Clinton called the Supreme Court's Citizens United decision "one of the worst ever made," adding, "we've got to get dark, unaccountable money out of politics once and for all."

Gun control:

"I think it's pretty clear that a majority of Americans and a majority of gun owners agree with universal background checks" to keep guns away from domestic abusers, the mentally unstable, "and even terrorists,"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton said.

"Let's not be afraid of the gun lobby, which does not represent the real majority of gun owners in America," she added.

On Democratic losses in the 2014 midterm elections, and what she hopes to leave behind:

Republicans, Clinton said, have shown an advantage during midterm elections that Democrats need to reckon with. "They know the importance of midterm elections because they show up, and we don't," she said.

Clinton stressed that she wants more young people getting involved in government. "This is my last rodeo. And I believe that we can leave not just the country in good shape for the future, but we can get a deep bench of young people to decide they want to go into politics to continue the fights that we're going to be waging," she said, later adding, "when I ride off into the sunset" in 2025, if she manages to win in 2016 and then an eventual second term, she hopes to leave "a very strong, committed group" behind in Iowa and the country at large.

Clinton backs 'pathway to citizenship,' criticizes GOP // USA Today // David Jackson – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton stressed Tuesday that she backs a “pathway to citizenship” for immigrants who are currently in the United States illegally, and she criticized potential Republican opponents over the immigration issue.

“We know we’re not going to deport 11, 12 million people,” Clinton told CNN in an interview, and providing a pathway that includes stiff requirements for new citizenship is the “right thing to do.”

The long list of Republican presidential candidates oppose such a pathway, Clinton said, and exhibit “a spectrum” of attitudes toward immigrants that ranges from “hostility” to grudging acceptance.

Immigration and the rising Hispanic vote figure to be major factors in the 2016, and Clinton served notice that she will be highlighting them.

In terms of specific candidates, Clinton criticized businessman Donald Trump for saying that most immigrants from Mexico are criminals, telling CNN she was “very disappointed” and that other Republicans should have criticized Trump sooner.

Trump said he was describing illegal immigration and that he is the only candidate willing to tackle the issue.

Clinton also challenged Jeb Bush’s immigration credentials, saying that if he backed a pathway to citizenship at one time, “he no longer does.”

Bush spokeswoman Emily Benavides disputed Clinton’s analysis, saying that the former Florida governor “believes in a conservative legislative solution to fix our broken immigration system that includes earned legal status for those currently in the country after they pay fines and taxes, learn English, and commit no substantial crimes while securing our border.”

In her CNN interview, Clinton declined to speculate on the prospect of another Clinton-Bush presidential race, more than two decades after Bill Clinton defeated President George H.W. Bush.

It depends on who the parties nominate, she said, noting that the Republicans have “a big crew” running in addition to Bush.

“What’s great about America is that anybody can run for president,” Clinton told CNN.

Clinton says 'very disappointed' in Trump's immigration comments // Reuters – July 7, 2015

Democratic presidential contender Hillary Clinton said on Tuesday she was "very disappointed" in Republican presidential hopeful Donald Trump for his comments that described immigrants from Mexico as drug-runners and rapists.

"I feel very bad and very disappointed with him and the Republican Party for not responding immediately and saying: 'Enough. Stop it,'" Clinton said in an interview with CNN.

Trump's remarks, delivered during a speech on June 16 in which he announced his plans to seek the Republican nomination for president, have sparked a backlash that has soured a number of his business relationships.
In the latest fallout, Trump's organization said earlier on Tuesday the Republican candidate and PGA of America had agreed to move a professional golfing event that had been scheduled for October at a Trump course.

Clinton told CNN her disappointment extended to the entire Republican field for not being open to a path toward U.S. citizenship for Mexicans in the United States illegally.

"They're on a spectrum of hostility ... all the way to grudging acceptance but refusal to go with a pathway to citizenship. I think that's a mistake," she said.

Hillary Clinton slams Trump, Bush on immigration // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton bashed her potential Republican rivals on immigration reform Tuesday in the first national television interview of her second presidential campaign.

But Clinton spoke in more specific detail about Donald Trump, whose incendiary recent comments on Mexican immigrants have led to almost a dozen companies to cut ties to the businessman. “I’m very disappointed in those comments and I feel very bad and very disappointed with him,” said Clinton of Trump, who has donated to her past campaigns. And in 2005, Clinton even attended Trump’s wedding to his current wife Melania Knauss.

Clinton added that she was disappointed “with the Republican Party for not responding immediately [to Trump] and saying enough, stop it. But they are all in the, you know, in the same general area on immigration,” she said.

Trump has been ranking in the top tier of recent polls of the 2016 Republican presidential field and is poised to potentially make the cutoff for the party’s first debates later this summer.

She wasn’t much kinder towards former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, the GOP frontrunner who has been more amendable to immigration in the past. “He doesn’t believe in a path to citizenship. If he did at one time he no longer does,” she said.

Bush’s campaign spokesperson Emily Benavides responded to Clinton’s criticism in a statement released on Tuesday. ”Hillary Clinton has once again changed her position on an issue for politically expedient purposes,” Benavides said before faulting her in part for failing to pass immigration reform as a senator. “Hillary Clinton will say anything to get elected and her numerous flip-flops on immigration prove it,” she added.

As for herself, Clinton reiterated: “I am 100% behind comprehensive immigration reform that includes a path to citizenship.”

Hillary Clinton just used Donald Trump to attack the entire GOP field // Business Insider // Colin Campbell – July 7, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is trying to connect all of her potential GOP rivals to real-estate developer Donald Trump.

Clinton responded to the ongoing Trump controversy in a Tuesday appearance on CNN, her first national media interview since launching her campaign in April.

The Democratic front-runner said she was "very disappointed" by Trump's heated remarks about illegal immigration. And she added that the entire Republican Party should have rushed to condemn them.

"I've very disappointed in those comments. And I feel very bad and very disappointed with him and with the Republican Party for not responding immediately and saying, 'Enough. Stop it,'" she said.

Clinton was referring to Trump's controversial campaign launch in June, when he slammed the Mexican government for supposedly sending "rapists" and drug runners to the US. A number of companies have since severed ties with Trump, indicating they found his comments offensive.

Clinton sought to group together all of the Republican candidates, including Trump, because they aren't supporters of comprehensive immigration reform like she is. That included former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R), who she pointed out does not support a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants living in the US.

"But they are all in the same general area on immigration," she said. "They don't want to provide a path to citizenship. They range across a spectrum of being either grudgingly welcome or hostile towards immigrants. And I'm going to talk about comprehensive immigration reform. I'm going to talk about all of the good, law-abiding, productive members of the immigrant community that I personally know."

described his immigration remarks as inappropriate — including Bush, former New York Gov. George Pataki (R), former Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R), Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Florida), and businesswoman Carly Fiorina.

Other contenders like Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson have dismissed the controversy as political correctness run amok.

Hillary Clinton Says She Is "Very Disappointed" in Donald Trump // Mother Jones // Inae Oh – July 7, 2015

In a new interview with CNN, Hillary Clinton weighed in on the continuing controversy over Donald Trump's presidential announcement speech in which he characterized Mexican immigrants crossing the border as criminals and "rapists."

"I am very disappointed in those comments," Clinton said. "I feel very bad and very disappointed with him and the Republican party for not responding immediately and saying 'enough stop it.'"

Trump's remarks have sparked national outrage over their racist descriptions, even prompting several businesses and television networks long associated with the real estate mogul to sever business ties with him. While most of the GOP presidential field have distanced themselves from Trump's comments, some including Sen. Ted Cruz have applauded him "on the need to address illegal immigration."

Trump has donated to Clinton's past campaigns on a number of occasions. He also contributed at least $100,000 to the Clinton Foundation.

Hillary Clinton Ties Jeb Bush to GOP Field on Immigration // TIME // Sam Frizell – July 7, 2015

Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton attempted to link her Republican counterpart, Jeb Bush, with other GOP presidential candidates who have staked out positions against immigration reform.

In her first sit-down television interview since as a candidate, Clinton told CNN that the 2016 Republican field ranges “across a spectrum of being either grudgingly welcome or hostile toward immigrants.”

She also took aim at Bush, arguing that the former Florida governor’s position on immigration is “regrettable.”

“He doesn’t believe in a path to citizenship,” she said. “If he did at one time, he no longer does.”

Bush has walked a fine line on immigration. In a 2013 book he called for allowing undocumented immigrants to obtain permanent residency but not citizenship, though he later supported a bipartisan Senate bill that included a path to citizenship. In recent remarks, he’s backed a legal status short of citizenship.

Clinton, meantime, has made immigration reform a central part of her platform, saying that she supports a full path to citizenship for undocumented workers and that she would go farther than President Obama in using executive actions to protect illegal immigrants from deportation.

Bush spokeswoman Emily Benavides criticized Clinton for the comments, noting that as a U.S. Senator in 2007 she voted for a so-called “poison pill” amendment that helped derail immigration reform under President George W. Bush.

“Hillary Clinton has once again changed her position on an issue for politically expedient purposes. After voting for the poison pill amendment that stopped immigration reform in its tracks as a Senator and saying she believed the unaccompanied minors ‘should be sent back’ to their home countries last year, she is now running further to the left on immigration policy than even President Obama’s White House believes is legally feasible,” she said in a statement.

During the interview, Clinton also denounced GOP presidential candidate Donald Trump, who has faced fire since he called Mexican immigrants “rapists” and “criminals” during his campaign launch last month. She said she was “very disappointed” with the business mogul, who previously donated to her Senate campaign and the Clinton Foundation.

But Clinton turned just as much fire on the Republican field overall, arguing it was not welcoming enough toward immigrants.

In the CNN interview, Clinton also denounced Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump’s comments about Mexican immigrants, whom the real estate mogul last month called “rapists” and “criminals.” Clinton said she was “very disappointed” with Trump, who donated to her Senate campaign and the Clinton Foundation.

Hillary Clinton: Jeb Bush 'doesn't believe in a path to citizenship' // Miami Herald // Patricia Mezzai – July 7, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton declared herself "very disappointed" at Donald Trump -- a past supporter of her U.S. Senate campaign -- over his now-infamous remarks in which he claimed Mexican immigrants who cross the U.S. border are often criminals and rapists.

"I feel very bad and very disappointed with him and with the Republican Party for not responding immediately and saying, 'Enough. Stop it,'" Clinton told CNN in an interview Tuesday. "But they are all in the same general area on immigration: They don't want to provide a path to citizenship. They range across a spectrum of being either grudgingly welcome or hostile toward immigrants."

Pressed about Republican Jeb Bush, who has called parents bringing children illegally into the U.S. an "act of love," Clinton maintained that the former Florida governor doesn't want to give people already in the country full-fledged legal status.

"He doesn't believe in a path to citizenship -- if he did at one time, he no longer does," she said. "As I said, they're on a spectrum of hostility which I think is really regrettable in a nation of immigrants like ours."

Bush has favored citizenship in the past. But in his book Immigration Wars, and recently on the campaign trail, he has instead backed legal status without citizenship, suggesting that might be a more achievable goal given contentious immigration politics.

Bush's camp countered by pointing to "flip-flops" by Clinton on immigration.

"Hillary Clinton has once again changed her position on an issue for politically expedient purposes. After voting for the poison pill amendment that stopped immigration reform in its tracks as a Senator and saying she believed the unaccompanied minors 'should be sent back' to their home countries last year, she is now running further to the left on immigration policy than even President Obama's White House believes is legally feasible," Bush spokeswoman Emily Benavides said in a statement.

"Hillary Clinton will say anything to get elected and her numerous flip-flops on immigration prove it."

Though Clinton didn't mention him, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio is one of the GOP contenders who says he's open to granting citizenship to many of the people in the country illegally. Bush, Rubio and South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, who shares a similar view, have all been criticized by some conservatives over their immigration support.

Hillary: All GOP candidates on a 'spectrum of hostility' toward im migrants // Breitbart // Pam Key – July 7, 2015

Tuesday on CNN's "The Lead With Jake Tapper," during a preview clip of their exclusive interview, Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton accused everyone in the Republican presidential field of being on a "spectrum of hostility," towards immigrants.

When asked about Donald Trump's recent controversial comments on immigrants Clinton said, "I'm very disappointed in those comments. I feel very bad and very disappointed with him and with the Republican party for not responding immediately and saying enough, stop it. But they are all in the same general area on immigration. You know, they don't want to provide a path to citizenship. They range across a spectrum of being begrudgingly welcoming or hostile toward immigrants. I'm going to talk about comprehensive immigration reform. I'm going to talk about the good law abiding, productive members of the immigrant community that I personally know. That I've met over the course of my life. That I would like to see have a path to citizenship."

When asked about Jeb Bush, Clinton said, "He doesn't believe in a path to citizenship. If he did at one time he no longer does. Pretty much as I said, they're on a spectrum of hostility, which I think is regrettable in a nation of immigrants like ours, all the way to grudging acceptance, but refusal to go with a pathway to citizenship. I think that's a mistake. We know we're not going to deport 11 or 12 million people. We shouldn't be breaking up families, we shouldn't be stopping people from having the opportunity to be fully integrated legally within our country. It's good for us. It's good economically, It's good for the taxes that will be legally collected. It's good for the children. So that they can go as far as their hard work and talent will take them. So I am 100 percent behind comprehensive immigration reform that includes a path to citizenship citizenship."

Hillary Clinton 'very disappointed' in T rump, GOP on immigration // The Hill // Niall Stanage & Jonathan Easley – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton slammed Donald Trump for his comments on Mexican immigrants in the first national interview of her presidential campaign.

“I'm very disappointed in those comments, and I feel very bad and very disappointed with him and with the Republican Party for not responding immediately and saying, 'Enough, stop," Clinton said in the interview with CNN's Brianna Keilar.

Clinton was referring to Trump's comments attributing rampant crime to illegal immigrants from Mexico, which sparked a firestorm.

Clinton sought to link Trump, a GOP White House hopeful, to the Republican Party as a whole on immigration, saying "They are all in the same general area on immigration."

At a public event attended by several hundred supporters at the Iowa City Public Library earlier in the day, Clinton blasted Republicans for opposing a pathway to citizenship for those in the country illegally.

"I don't care how many people running for president on the Republican side try to demean immigrants, insult immigrants, cast aspersions on immigrants," Clinton said. “We are not going to deport 11 or 12 million people. … The Republican candidates, and it’s not just the ones who are most vitriolic, none of them support a path to citizenship. All of them would basically resign them to a life as second-class citizens.”

Clinton said that if elected president, she would return to the immigration bill passed by the Senate in 2010 that died in the House.

“That would be my starting point,” Clinton said. “You voted for it once. Let's vote for it again."

In her CNN interview, Clinton was asked about former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, a leading candidate for the GOP nomination.

"He doesn't believe in a path to citizenship," she responded. "If he did at one time, he no longer does."

Clinton also pushed back on suggestions, backed by polling, that a significant segment of the public distrusts her.

She described such attacks as "a theme that has been used against me, and my husband, for many, many years." She added that she trusted the electorate to make up its own mind.

Clinton took a question about the rise of Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders (I) in stride, saying she “always thought this would be a competitive race.”

Sanders has been pulling crowds of thousands of supporters and has cut into Clinton’s previously huge leads in the early-voting states of Iowa and New Hampshire. On Monday, Clinton Communications Director Jennifer Palmieri called Sanders “a serious force” her team is worried about.

But on Tuesday, Clinton touted the strength of her organization in Iowa, where she continues to lead Sanders by more than 20 points, according to the RealClearPolitics average of polls.

“I feel very good about where we are in Iowa we are signing up thousands of volunteers, people committed to caucus for us, a committed supporter in every one of the 1,600 precincts, and one of lessons I learned last time is organize, organize, organize,” Clinton said. “You’ve got to get people committed and then you bring more people. So I feel very good about where my campaign is."

Hillary to meet with black lawmakers // The Hill // Christina Marcos – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton will take a break from the presidential campaign trail July 14 to meet with lawmakers, including the Congressional Black Caucus, on Capitol Hill.

According to a Clinton official, the Democratic presidential front-runner will also meet with members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus and the Congressional Asian Pacific American Caucus.

The meetings with each of the caucuses come as Clinton seeks to rebuild the diverse coalition that propelled President Obama into the White House.

Congressional Black Caucus (CBC) spokeswoman Candace Randle said lawmakers and the Democratic presidential front-runner will "discuss the CBC’s agenda and policy issues impacting the African-American community." Clinton’s closed-press meetings with lawmakers will be her first visit to Capitol Hill since formally announcing her presidential campaign in April. However, her campaign team has been in contact with members of each of the caucuses since the start of her candidacy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The 46-member CBC is made up almost entirely of House Democrats, with the exceptions of Sen. Cory Booker (D-N.J.) and Rep. Mia Love (R-Utah). Two nonvoting delegates, Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) and Stacey Plaskett (D-Virgin Islands), are also part of the caucus.

A total of 106 Democrats have already endorsed Clinton for president, including many members of the CBC.

CBC members who have declared support for Clinton include Booker and Reps. Karen Bass (Calif.), Joyce Beatty (Ohio), Eddie Bernice Johnson (Texas), Emanuel Cleaver (Mo.), Danny Davis (Ill.), Alcee Hastings (Fla.), Sheila Jackson Lee (Texas), Hank Johnson (Ga.), John Lewis (Ga.), Gregory Meeks (N.Y.), Charles Rangel (N.Y.), Cedric Richmond (La.), David Scott (Ga.), Terri Sewell (Ala.), Marc Veasey (Texas) and Frederica Wilson (Fla.).

Clinton has frequently waded into national discussions about race in recent months, including an April speech where she called for criminal justice reform and blasted racially charged police shootings.

“From Ferguson to Staten Island to Baltimore, the patterns have become unmistakable and undeniable,” Clinton said.

The former secretary of State said last month at a black church outside of St. Louis — not far from where the shooting in Ferguson, Mo., unfolded last summer — that the recent shooting in Charleston, S.C., shows the nation has more work to do in addressing race relations.

“I know it’s tempting to dismiss this tragedy as an isolated incident, to believe in today’s America that bigotry is largely behind us, that institutional racism no longer exists,” Clinton said. “But despite our best efforts and highest hopes, America’s long struggle with race is far from finished.”

Clinton has further sought to highlight her position on immigration reform compared to the GOP field. She told CNN in her first nationally televised interview on Tuesday that she was "very disappointed" with Donald Trump for his controversial comments about Mexicans, as well as with the rest of the Republican field for not thoroughly condemning them.

The Clinton Campaign Corralled Reporters, But Don't Expect Them To Skip The Next Parade // HuffPo // Michael Calderone – July 7, 2015

When a top-tier presidential candidate strides down Main Street, smiling and waving at parade-goers, political reporters and photographers are sure to follow. And follow they did on Saturday in Gorham, New Hampshire.

But run-of-the-mill campaigning quickly turned into media outrage as aides to Hillary Clinton reined in journalists with rope. The literal corralling spurred heaps of criticism, both of Clinton's campaign for being too controlling and the press corps for being too subservient.

The incident also prompted a larger question for newsrooms grappling with so many candidates to cover and so much information to sift through this election cycle: Is sending a reporter to a typical Fourth of July parade worth the hassle?

Daily Beast executive editor Noah Shachtman, who criticized the Clinton campaign’s heavy-handed tactics, said the incident affirmed his site’s tactical approach to the crowded field. "We have a small staff, so we’re not going to cover every burp and gaffe of all 900 people running for president," said Shachtman, who did not send a reporter to the parade.

He suggested reporters' time is better spent digging through documents and speaking to people impacted by political leaders' decisions, rather than flocking to stage-managed events. “We don’t want to do chock-a-block commodity news," he added, "and so, frankly, these events like parades are most of the time so newsless they’re not even worth covering.”

But it's the possibility of news being made that helps other editors justify dispatching reporters to the front lines of flag-strewn parade routes or meet-and-greets at the local diner. A candidate sticking to talking points at one event may open up at the next to a voter, or critic, thus offering a unique glimpse into his or her candidacy.

“We travel with candidates to see them in action, to see them interact with voters, to see who (and how many people) turn out for their events and to gather voters' impressions,” Carolyn Ryan, Washington bureau chief for The New York Times, said in an email.

“All these moments are revealing, in their own way: You never know when a college student is going to press Jeb Bush about Iraq or when Martin O'Malley is going to have to talk directly to people upset about the violence in Baltimore,” said Ryan. She also singled out Okie Howe, a 98-year-old Army veteran quoted in the paper’s round-up of July 4 campaign events around New Hampshire, who spoke about being a Democrat who was "sick of Hillary

Clinton" but would likely vote for her anyway.

The goal, in essence, is to ensure that you're present when a non-manufactured campaign event takes place, even if it means suffering the occasional humiliation of a human corralling.

BuzzFeed political editor Katherine Miller said that while covering 2016 candidates, especially Clinton, “you don’t have a lot of unpredictable moments or situations where you see them interact with a lot of unknowns.” Clinton, she noted, was only at the July 4 parade “for 20 minutes and a ton of stuff happened.”

The resulting dispatch, from reporter Ruby Cramer, “showed what it looks like in a controlled environment when Clinton is speaking versus a very uncontrolled environment and what it says about her, what it says about the campaign," Miller said.

That report doesn't focus on policy. But for the past three months, much of the story surrounding Clinton has been process-themed -- from her handling of emails while secretary of State and the company she keeps to the combustible relationship she has with the press corps.

Clinton, the Democratic front-runner long before she officially jumped in the race in April, essentially has a mini-White House press corps along for the ride. Candidates trying to bolster their name recognition would kill for such attention, but the Clinton team, managing the movements of one of the most famous people in the world, is more likely to bristle at reporters’ desire for increased access to the candidate.

But so far, disputes over access haven’t led news organizations to stop covering Clinton's every move. And neither The New York Times nor BuzzFeed, part of a 14-member traveling press pool covering Clinton, is altering their game plan for dispatching reporters in light of Saturday’s debacle.

“I think the rope line was bad optics but a bit overblown on Twitter,” Ryan said. “I do wish Mrs. Clinton had taken some time to answer more reporters' questions before or after the parade.”

Hillary Clinton: ‘People Should and Do Trust Me’ // CNN // Eric Bradner – July 7, 2015

In Hillary Clinton's first national interview of the 2016 race, she attacked her Republican rivals on immigration and dismissed the suggestion that the American people have a problem trusting her.

"People should and do trust me," she told CNN's Brianna Keilar.

She blamed the "barrage of attacks that are largely fomented by and coming from the right" for fueling a perception that trust is an area of vulnerability for her.

Clinton displayed little hesitation about attacking Republicans herself, saying that she is "very disappointed" in Donald Trump for his comments about immigrants and in the Republican Party for not condemning his remarks more quickly.

She then pivoted to skewering the entire GOP field for their immigration stance, saying, "They're on a spectrum of hostility, which I think is really regrettable in a nation of immigrants like ours."

The interview foreshadowed the Clinton that will hit the campaign trail in the coming months as election season heats up. She was occasionally defensive, especially when pressed on whether she has any responsibility for the public's mistrust in her. But she had no problem with going on the offense against her Republican challengers.

Clinton took direct aim at GOP rival Jeb Bush.

"He doesn't believe in a path to citizenship. If he did at one time, he no longer does," she said.

The Bush campaign rebuffed Clinton's criticism and instead accused her of flip-flopping on immigration.

"Hillary Clinton will say anything to get elected and her numerous flip-flops on immigration prove it," said Emily Benavides, a Bush campaign spokeswoman, in a statement.

"As he outlined in his book on this issue, Gov. Bush believes in a conservative legislative solution to fix our broken immigration system that includes earned legal status for those currently in the country after they pay fines and taxes, learn English and commit no substantial crimes while securing our border," she said.

Clinton also blamed the city of San Francisco for mishandling the case of an undocumented immigrant who had been deported five times before killing a woman there -- in a sanctuary city where local law enforcement do not enforce federal immigration laws.

"The city made a mistake, not to deport someone that the federal government strongly felt should be deported," she said. "I have absolutely no support for a city that ignores the strong evidence that should be acted on."

The full interview aired Tuesday on "The Situation Room with Wolf Blitzer" and will re-air at 8 p.m. on "Anderson Cooper 360."

Pressed on why the public has a hard time trusting her, Clinton maintained she faced "the same kind of onslaught" in her two New York Senate campaigns and her confirmation as secretary of state, and said Republicans have sought to turn controversies like her use of a private email address and the Clinton Foundation's actions against her.

And that, Clinton said, is why national polls and swing-state surveys have found that a majority of voters say they don't see her as honest and trustworthy.

A Quinnipiac University Swing State poll found that by margins of 8 to 14 percentage points voters in Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania are skeptical of Clinton's trustworthiness.

In Florida, 51% of voters hold the negative view of Clinton, compared to 43% who feel she is trustworthy. In Ohio, 53% of voters find Clinton not trustworthy, compared to 40% who do. And in Pennsylvania, 54% of voters don't find her honest, while 40% do.

"I think it's understandable that when questions are raised, people maybe are thinking about them and wondering about them," Clinton said.

"But I have every confidence that during the course of this campaign, people are going to know who will fight for them, who will be there when they need them, and that's the kind of person I am and that's what I will do, not only in a campaign but as president," she said.

Asked whether she played a role in the sentiment reflected in polls that she's not trustworthy, Clinton said: "This has been a theme that has been used against me and my husband for many, many years. And at the end of the day, I think voters sort it all out."

She similarly dismissed questions about her use of a personal email address on a private server while serving as secretary of state.

Clinton said she turned over all the emails -- including some which show her using a secured fax machine, or asking for iced tea during meetings -- that had anything to do with public business, and that she broke no laws in sticking with one device because she's not technically savvy.

"This is being blown up with no basis in law or in fact. That's fine, I get it -- this is being, in effect, used by the Republicans in the Congress. OK," Clinton said. "But I want people to understand what the truth is, and the truth is, everything I did was permitted and I went above and beyond what was expected."

If elected president, Clinton said she doesn't have any plans to push for the closure of the Clinton Foundation -- which has faced criticism for accepting foreign contributions during her tenure as America's top diplomat -- if she's elected president.

"I have no plans to say or do anything about the Clinton foundation other than to say I am proud of it and I think for the good of the world, its work should continue," she said.

The interview spanned a broad range of topics -- among them a discussion of adding a woman to the $10 bill. Clinton declined to select a favorite woman for the honor, but suggested a woman should instead go on a $20.

"I don't like the idea that as a compromise you would basically have two people on the same bill. One would be a woman. That sounds pretty second class to me," Clinton said. "So I think a woman should have her own bill."

Nor would she pick which Saturday Night Live actress, Amy Poehler or Kate McKinnon, plays the best Hillary Clinton.

"Amy's a friend of mine and Kate's doing a great job. You're not going to get me to pick one or the other," she said. "I think I'm the best Hillary Clinton."

Top 8 takeaways from Hillary Clinton's first big interview // CNN // Eric Bradner - July 7, 2015

Iowa City, Iowa - Hillary Clinton was keenly aware of how long she'd gone as a presidential candidate without sitting down for a nationally televised interview.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Ninety days on Sunday," she told CNN's Brianna Keilar on Tuesday in the first of what will be a series of national interviews.

As Bernie Sanders rises in the polls among liberals and Republicans continue to make Clinton the subject of a barrage of attacks, her answers offered some insight into the Democratic frontrunner's thinking at this stage of the campaign.

Here are eight of Clinton's key statements -- and why they matter for 2016:

1. "This has been a theme that has been used against me and my husband for many, many years."

Three decades in the limelight have meant both Bill and Hillary Clinton have weathered intense scrutiny and criticism. Clinton acknowledged that polls show a majority of Americans don't view her as honest and trustworthy -- but true to her long-standing posture declined to take any responsibility for the sentiment.

The latest round of public incredulity focuses on her use of a private email address while serving as secretary of state, and her family foundation's acceptance of foreign contributions during that tenure.

Clinton sees those as the latest in a long line of unfair attacks from Republicans, rather than legitimate lines of inquiry. And she claims she's not sweating the "trust" problem.

"At the end of the day, I think voters sort it all out," Clinton said.

2. "They're on a spectrum of hostility, which I think it's really regrettable in a nation of immigrants like ours."

It was a direct assault on the entire Republican presidential field -- and Jeb Bush, in particular.

Clinton used a question about Donald Trump's controversial remarks about Mexican immigrants to hammer her GOP opponents, saying that they don't support providing undocumented immigrants with pathways to gaining U.S. citizenship. By painting Bush, Trump and the rest of the Republican field with the same brush, Clinton hopes to hurt the entire party in a general election with Latino voters.

"I'm very disappointed in those comments and I feel very bad and very disappointed with him and with the Republican Party for not responding immediately and saying, 'Enough, stop it,'" Clinton said.

Bush -- and other Republicans -- eventually criticized Trump's comments, but only after several days had passed.

3. "The city made a mistake not to deport someone that the federal government strongly felt should be deported."

Clinton still senses some danger on the issue of illegal immigration, criticizing San Francisco for failing to deport a man who'd been sent back to Mexico five times before -- and has admitted killing a woman after returning again.

The man was released from police custody in April after drug charges were dropped, and he wasn't deported because San Francisco is a "sanctuary city" for undocumented immigrants, despite the Department of Homeland Security weighing in.

She's said she supports going further than President Barack Obama has on undocumented immigrants -- but only for those who obey the law.

"I have absolutely no support for a city that ignores the strong evidence that should be acted on," she said.

4. "I am happy to have a chance to get out and run my campaign as I see fit and let other candidates do exactly the same."

In other words: I'm not going to talk about Bernie Sanders.

Recent polls show Sanders climbing closer to Clinton in New Hampshire and Iowa, two key early voting states. But Clinton isn't yet ready to directly engage Sanders, training her fire instead on Republicans.

That's in part because her campaign wants to see whether Sanders has staying power, and in part because by attacking him, she risks elevating his already growing stature.

5. "One of the things I learned last time is organize, organize, organize."

Clinton is trying to atone for the sins of her 2008 campaign among Iowa Democratic caucus voters by taking the process seriously.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's why she was in Iowa City -- in the heart of eastern Iowa, which went heavily for Barack Obama in the 2008 caucuses.

Clinton has shown she's able to learn from her mistakes: Those who followed her 2008 Iowa campaign say they see a looser, more comfortable candidate; and she's ejected many of the most divisive figures from that previous bid.

Now, she's touting having signed up a volunteer to work the caucus process for her in all of Iowa's more than 1,600 precincts.

"You've got to get people committed, and then they will bring more people through," Clinton said.

6. "I'm not running my campaign for the press. I'm running it for the voters."

Throughout her nascent campaign, Clinton has been criticized for rarely taking questions from the press. That criticism was thrust to the forefront again over the Fourth of July holiday when photos of reporters being held back by a moving rope line at a parade were published.

Instead, Clinton said she's preferred small group events that have allowed her to reconnect with average Americans after more than six years out of domestic politics. She's also been a tireless fundraiser, attending house party after house party to raise $45 million in the campaign's first three months.

Still, Clinton said she's ready to shift gears: The CNN interview, she said, was the first of what will be a number of sit-downs with national outlets.

7. "A secure fax machine, which is harder to work than the regular."

A tense exchange about Clinton's use of a personal email address on a private server while at the State Department turned light, when Clinton cracked jokes and once again sought to send the message: Nothing to see here, let's move along.

"Now, I didn't have to turn over anything," Clinton said. "I chose to turn over 55,000 pages because I wanted to go above and beyond what was expected of me because I knew the vast majority of everything that was official already was in the State Department system."

Then, she added: "Now I think it's kind of fun. People get to see a real-time, behind-the-scenes look at what I was emailing about and what I was communicating about."

Keilar highlighted the emails that showed Clinton messaging now-top aide John Podesta about wearing socks to bed, and an exchange depicting an epic struggle by Clinton to operate a fax machine.

On the latter, Clinton couldn't help but offer a defense.

"Yes, a secure fax machine, which is harder to work than the regular," she said.

8. "I think I'm the best Hillary Clinton."

Asked by Keilar which "Saturday Night Live" actress best satirizes her on the NBC program, Clinton demurred, but offered praise for both Amy Poehler, who impersonated her in 2008, and Kate McKinnon, who has done the job so far in this campaign cycle.

"Amy's a friend of mine and Kate's doing a great job. You're not going to get me to pick one or the other," she said. "I think I'm the best Hillary Clinton, to be honest."

Hillary Clinton is making the rounds in every corner of the good ol' U.S. of A., and one of her most recent stops was at Lebanon, New Hampshire, where she encountered all sorts of characters during her campaign trip. One unidentified fellow stirred up some deep rumblings online after her official Twitter account on Tuesday tweeted and then deleted a photo of Clinton shaking hands with a white man whose forearm sported a very visible "white" tattoo. Now, we don't necessarily know what the "white" tattoo actually stands for, but I mean, I'm pretty sure the guy's tat doesn't have to do with his undying love for Breaking Bad's Walter White.

The now deleted photo was captioned with, "I think we are a nation that really believes in a helping hand, in the generosity of connecting with friends, neighbors, and strangers to give them chance they might not otherwise have." The Hillary quote came from a speech Clinton gave at Dartmouth College over the Fourth of July weekend, during which the presidential candidate detailed her mother's struggles growing up.

But let's not take the photo at face value. Clinton was shaking lots of hands that day, and this unfortunately became the snapshot her campaign chose to represent the "every American" candidate meeting with normal folks outside a Dairy Twirl. According to BuzzFeed, the Clinton camp said the tweet and photo were "removed out of caution after people pointed out the tattoo."

OK, so let's acknowledge that Clinton's Twitter isn't solo-managed by her. She obviously has a team of people running the Twitter machine on her behalf. But that's what makes the mistake that much more ridiculous. You can bet someone got fired for this. Or at least, a fierce tongue lashing.

Once again hawk-eyed Twittizens, thank you for capturing and saving every "oops" moment coming out of this election circuit circus.

How Hillary Clinton's campaign fakes grassroots love // NY Post // Philip Rucker - July 8, 2015

One day in May, operatives from a Washington-based super PAC gathered New Hampshire mayors, state representatives and local politicos at St. Anselm College for a day of training.

They rehearsed their personal tales of how they met Hillary Rodham Clinton and why they support her for president. They sharpened their defenses of her record as secretary of state.

They scripted their arguments for why the Democratic front-runner has been "a lifetime champion of income opportunity." And they polished their on-camera presentations in a series of mock interviews.

The objective of the sessions: To nurture a seemingly grass-roots echo chamber of Clinton supporters reading from the same script in communities across New Hampshire, a critical state that hosts the nation's first presidential primary.

The super PAC, called Correct the Record, convened similar talking-point tutorials and media-training classes in May and June in three other early voting states — Iowa, South Carolina and Nevada — as well as sessions earlier this spring in California.

Presidential campaigns have for decades fed talking points to surrogates who appear on national TV or introduce candidates on the stump.

But the effort to script and train local supporters is unusually ambitious and illustrates the extent to which the Clinton campaign and its web of sanctioned, allied super PACs are leaving nothing to chance.

When, say, a Londonderry Times reporter calls a Rockingham County Democratic Committee member for comment on Clinton, he or she will parrot Correct the Record's talking points about Clinton having been a fighter for the middle class — from improving rural health care as first lady of Arkansas to raising the minimum wage as a New York senator.

"We are holding sessions with top communicators across the country where we talk about the best ways to discuss Secretary Clinton's strong record of accomplishments, how to articulate Secretary Clinton's positions most effectively and how to correct Republican operatives' distortions of the facts," said Adrienne Watson, communications director at Correct the Record.

Correct the Record — one of several super PACs run by Clinton ally David Brock — coordinates some of its activities with Clinton's campaign, but officials said the campaign played no role in the training sessions.

Clinton's campaign has its own surrogate operation that distributes talking points to supporters to ensure their messages in local and national media are consistent.

The super PAC's on-camera media training was conducted by the Franklin Forum and led by the group's president, John Neffinger, a Democratic strategist who specializes in coaching people for television interviews.

Correct the Record held a series of similar media sessions in the spring of 2014 to prepare Clinton backers for interviews surrounding her national book tour for "Hard Choices," the memoir from her State Department years.

To supporters like Eleni Kounalakis, who served as ambassador to Hungary in Clinton's State Department, the program is welcome news.

In March, she participated with about 20 other supporters in a Correct the Record session in San Francisco and said it helped her and other Clinton fans refine the case they make for Clinton's candidacy in public.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Many people who are very vocal in supporting Secretary Clinton are very comfortable talking about why among their friends and in small groups — but when it comes to talking to the media, that can be very intimidating," Kounalakis said. "Some people feel like, I know Hillary has been there for the working person in her life, in her career, but I want someone to help me prepare those arguments so that I have that confidence to speak in a broader context."

Nick Sottile, 21, president of the College Democrats of South Carolina, said he felt "lucky" to attend a May 7 Correct the Record session in Columbia, SC.

"It got right to the heart of things — how to cut through the noise and talk about Secretary Clinton's record," Sottile said. "And not just what to say, but how to talk about her as a young person in South Carolina. It was good training in how to be an effective talker."

Hillary Clinton Thinks Email Scandal Is Annoying, Says Everything She Did Was Legal, So Back Off // Bustle // Chris Tognotti – July 7, 2015

Tuesday was a huge day for Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton, owing to the occasion of her first major press interview — she sat down to speak with CNN's Briana Keilar, and the pair covered a number of topics. Including one area of conversation that's been dogging her for months now, one which she hasn't offered much comment on since a press conference in March — that's right, I'm talking about that private email controversy. Hillary Clinton talked about the emails in her CNN interview, and her response was that everything was legal and proper.

While the email story had somewhat faded from the headlines since March, it was stirred up again last week when the State Department released a selection of 3,000 messages sent from her private email account — that she had a private account at all has raised criticism, thanks to the ever-present threat of hacking and cyber-warfare in this day and age.

It probably shouldn't come as much surprise that Clinton didn't dive into the issue with so much scrutiny as to reinflame any criticism — from her perch as the frontrunner in the Democratic field, outpacing the still-distant second-place challenger Bernie Sanders of Vermont, it could be a conscious political strategy to not dive into certain sensitive topics when she can avoid it. But to Keilar's credit, the issue was raised in the high-profile interview, giving us all a chance to see how Clinton responded in an on-the-record setting.

As Keilar asked her to explain her mindset in deleting tens of thousands of emails from her private server after her tenure as Secretary of State, Clinton made her disdain for the issue obvious.

Everything i did was permitted. There was no law, there was no regulation, there was nothing that did not give me full authority to decide how to communicate. Previous Secretaries of State have said they did the same thing, and people across the government knew that I used one device. Maybe it was because I'm not the most technically capable person, and wanted to make it as simple as possible.

Keilar didn't let the issue lie, however — she pressed further, invoking a subpoena over Clinton's emails, something the former Secretary disputed immediately.

You're starting with so many assumptions, I've never had a subpoena. Let's take a deep breath here. Everything i did was permitted by law and regulation. ... I chose to turn over 55,000 pages because I wanted to go above and beyond what was expected of me, because i knew everything that was official was already in the state department system.
Obviously, this was but one small, isolated part of a far rangier interview, and to be fair to Clinton, the email criticism has always been less about her qualifications and viability as a candidate and a potential president than her transparency.

But considering how the full scope of the interview, transparency issues seem like they could get pretty crucial for her. Keilar also questioned Clinton about her flagging trustworthiness ratings, asking whether she bore any responsibility for the situation, and Clinton didn't cede much ground — she instead blamed Republican narratives and attacks.

Clinton has drawn some fire over the last week for her campaign's treatment of the press, and while it's still too early to say whether the more controlled, reserved approach will help or hurt her, this much seems clear: she's trying not to extend herself unnecessarily, unless a real threat were to emerge from the Democratic field. The more you have to duke it out in the primaries, laying out concrete policy positions (Sanders will surely challenge Clinton from the left), the harder it can be to recalibrate your image for a general election's national audience.

And all candidates do attempt that kind of recalibration, even if they never say it. That was essentially what Romney campaign adviser Eric Fehrnstrom meant with his infamous "etch-a-sketch" remark in 2012, which brought a lot of derision and criticism on the campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This could potentially be a risky strategy, sure, although there aren't any Senator Barack Obamas out there anymore. Whatever you think of Bernie Sanders, who's well-loved by many in the party's left-wing, he's not quite the charismatic rhetorical force that Obama was in 2008.

But obviously, Clinton has to submit to questions from the press every now and then, and Keilar was first-up to secure that opportunity. Clinton's explanation on the email controversy will surely not be enough for her critics, and maybe even some of her supporters, but it remains to be seen whether this is something that voters will truly care about when the early primaries roll around.

Hillary Clinton on Bernie Sanders: It's going to be 'competitive' // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton said Tuesday that she was not surprised by Democratic challenger Bernie Sanders' recent surge in polls, adding that running for president should not easy.

"This is going to be competitive. It should be competitive," she told reporters in Iowa ahead of the first national television interview of her second presidential campaign. "The more the better."

Sanders, a senator from Vermont, has been attracting large crowds as he travels to early voting states and liberal cities across the country. Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, has so far declined to engage directly with her challenger, saying she'll leave it up to the voters.

Clinton spoke at the Iowa City Public Library in Iowa City, a Democratic stronghold that she hopes to win in the state's critical caucuses in February 2016. She also took questions from the audience after facing criticism in recent days for limiting public and press access to her.

After facing criticism for keeping reporters behind a rope line during a July 4 parade, Clinton cracked a joke about the incident. "Is that the equivalent of a rope we have up there? I think it should come down. I don't want anybody to stress," she said, instructing an aide to take down the barrier between her and the press.

Getting a bit reflective, Clinton called the 2016 campaign "my last rodeo" and vowed to work to build the Democratic Party in Washington and across the country to outlive her time in public office. Clinton marveled when she realized that, if her presidential run were successful and she won re-election, she would not retire until 2025. "Golly," she said as she worked the math out in her head.

Clinton seemed to acknowledge that Democrats lack a deep pool of national talent, a fact some have blamed on her freezing out competition in the Democratic primary. "I believe that we can leave the country in good shape for the future and we can get a deep bench," she said.

And she vowed to whip Democrats into shape for midterm elections, which tend to favor the GOP thanks to higher Republican voter turnout. "They know the importance of midterm elections because they show up, and we don't," she said of Democrats.

During her remarks, Clinton took the opportunity to discuss immigration reform, an issue that she has so far discussed mainly in front of Latino audiences. "I'm going to make this a big issue in the campaign. I'm going to talk about it like I talked about it here, and I'll talk about it everywhere, because I want people who vote for me to know they're voting for comprehensive immigration reform," she said.

Many of Clinton's Republican opponents, she continued, are trying to "demean immigrants, insult immigrants, cast aspersion on immigrants." And their plans for immigration reform would relegate migrants to "second-class status," Clinton added.

Clinton also weighed in on the debt crisis in Greece, calling the issue "a tragedy." Clinton said she hoped for a resolution that "keeps Greece in the eurozone and keeps Europe united."

She declined to take a stance on the marathon negotiations with Iran over its nuclear program, however, saying it would be inappropriate to comment while the talks continue. She reiterated that any deal "needs to be full transparency, disclosure and verifiable inspections going forward."

Clinton also warned that the fight over Obamacare is not over, despite the recent Supreme Court ruling upholding a key pillar of the law. "If a Republican is elected president, that will be the end of the Affordable Care Act," she said.

Grassley Probing Clinton Aide's Dual Role at State, Clinton Foundation // Free Beacon // Alana Goodman – July 7, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R., Iowa) called on the State Department to turn over documents related to Hillary Clinton's top aide Cheryl Mills' special employment status at the agency in a letter to Secretary John Kerry on Monday.
Grassley also demanded to know why the State Department omitted Mills from a list of "special government employees," or "SGEs," for 2009 that it turned over to the Senate Judiciary Committee last year.

The State Department told the Washington Free Beacon last month that Mills was an "SGE" in 2009, which freed her from some ethics rules restrictions and allowed her to hold outside employment and serve on the Clinton Foundation board.

Grassley said this disclosure "directly contradicts the information that the State Department provided to this Committee."

Grassley's letter was prompted by a Free Beacon article last month that reported long-time Clinton aide Cheryl Mills had simultaneously worked as State Department chief of staff and as New York University's general counsel from January to May 2009.

Mills also continued to serve on the board of the Clinton Foundation for over a month after joining the State Department. During this time she was involved in discussions about vetting Bill Clinton's paid speeches for potential conflicts of interest, according to internal agency emails.

Grassley said in the letter that Mills' "simultaneous relationship with the State Department, Clinton Foundation and her actions on behalf of President Clinton's paid speaking engagements raise important questions."

He also noted that "federal law prohibits SGEs and full time employees from participating personally and substantially in matters that have a direct and predictable effect on their financial interests or financial interests of others with whom they have certain relationships."

Grassley called on Kerry to explain why Mills' special employment status was not disclosed to the committee, whether any steps were taken to prevent ethics law violations, and whether she was recused from any matters while working as an SGE.
The senator also asked why she was designated as an SGE, whether it had an impact on her security clearance, and whether she disclosed her relationship with the Clinton Foundation to the State Department. He called on Kerry to respond by July 20.

Grassley has also made inquiries into Clinton aide Huma Abedin's prior SGE status at the State Department.

Dem Millenials In Iowa Not Ready To Fully Support Clinton // CBS – July 7, 2015

Democratic millenials in Iowa aren't ready to fully throw their support behind Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton.

CBS News spoke to several young Democrats for their take on the former secretary of state.

"I talk to some of my friends and they're already on the Hillary Clinton bandwagon and they're going to do whatever it takes to make sure she's elected and then I have some other friends who maybe aren't quite as excited or maybe really just want to hear more about what people have to say about the issues before they make their decision," Nathan Erickson told CBS News. "I think that Democrats and the American public as a whole would benefit from a good, strong primary on both sides and then a good general election."

Erickson added that he's interested in hearing more from two other candidates: former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb.

Ryan Crane, who caucused for John Edwards in 2008, says he's kicking the tires on all the Democratic candidates.

"Hillary Clinton of course has a certain air of inevitability… but you know she didn't do great in Iowa, as we all remember in 2008, so it is beneficial to keep an open mind and look at all the candidates," Crane explained to CBS News.

Democratic political consultant Sam Roecker tells CBS News that Clinton needs to spend time in the state to win Iowans over.

"There's a lot of support for Hillary in Iowa but Iowans do take the caucuses very seriously; they know that this isn't a coronation of any candidate, they know that they will take the time to meet with these candidates, go to events with them, listen to what they have to say, listen to their vision for the country, and then make a decision. This isn't something where they have their minds set from the start," he said.

Clinton plans to give CNN her first one-on-one national television interview since launching her 2016 presidential campaign.

The network said on Monday the Clinton interview with CNN's Brianna Keilar will air Tuesday at 5 p.m. and again at 8 p.m. EDT. CNN said Clinton will be interviewed during a campaign stop in Iowa City, Iowa.

The Democratic presidential front-runner has conducted local interviews in the early voting states of Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada but has yet to sit for a one-on-one interview with national media.Clinton has emphasized smaller events and house parties since launching her campaign.

Clinton has a solid lead in polls but Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, her main Democratic challenger, has recently drawn large crowds.

Hillary Clinton Deletes Photo Of Herself And Man With "White" Tattoo // Buzzfeed // Claudia Koerner – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign removed a photo Tuesday showing Clinton shaking hands with a man with a tattoo that said "white" on his arm.

The tweet was removed from Clinton's account, but not before it had been retweeted by others.

The photo was taken outside Dairy Twirl in Lebanon, New Hampshire, where Clinton stopped on July 3.

The town is in New Hampshire's White Mountains region, where Clinton spent the Independence Day weekend walking in a parade and speaking with voters.

Clinton shook many hands over the weekend. The identity of the man — or the significance of his tattoo — was not immediately clear.

According to Clinton's campaign, she was meeting people along the street when the man came up to her and asked to shake her hand.

The tweet and photo were removed out of caution after people pointed out the tattoo, the campaign said.

Hillary Clinton's guide to throwing a house party // Political Party Time // Nicko Margolies – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton may be raising more than half a million dollars a day, but in a guide written by her campaign intended for grassroots event hosts the emphasis is on the collection of data about attendees. The document, obtained by the Sunlight Foundation's Political Party Time and embedded below, tells hosts that sharing the sign-up data of the guests is "the single most important thing you can do for the campaign and for Hillary."

The "House Party Host Guide" runs through the logistical process, legal hurdles and effective tactics for an event to transform potential voters into active campaign participants and donors. There is extensive sample language for every correspondence and design templates, like the invitation seen above to the right, to ensure grassroots communications match the tone of the general campaign.

The campaign encourages hosts in the guide to "Enter your information in at www.hilllaryclinton.com/data ." That link goes to a form to enter attendees and offers an alternative if that is too burdensome: "Remember, if you don't want to enter folks 1 by 1, you can email your guest list to grassrootsdata@hillaryclinton.com ."

While the guide does tell hosts, "If it makes sense for your party, feel free to ask for donations," the downplay of money is markedly different than the dozens of large donor fundraising invitations collected by Political Party Time. An invitation to a series of "Conversations with Hillary" events in early June includes the dollar amount to attend (up to $2,700) and an event on July 2 requires a donation and RSVP to get the address.

Read the entire guide below, and help us follow the 2016 money by anonymously uploading any invitation you receive here.

Hillary Clinton: hacking problem not limited to China // Reuters – July 7, 2015

Democratic presidential contender Hillary Clinton on Tuesday said hacking is a broad threat to U.S. security and business that often comes from other countries such as China and Iran, and the federal government has not done enough to protect U.S. information.

"It's not only the Chinese. We know that other governments - Russia, North Korea, Iran - have either directly or indirectly sponsored hacking," said the former Secretary of State during a campaign stop in Iowa, a key state in deciding Democrats' nominee for the 2016 presidential election. "And we worry about terrorist organizations getting access to the capacity."

Hillary Clinton: Cyber Legislation in Congress Is 'Not Enough' to Stop Foreign Hackers // National Journal // Dustin Volz – July 7, 2015

Presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Tuesday said that stalled cybersecurity legislation in Congress "doesn't go far enough" to protect the U.S. from debilitating hacks sponsored by a cadre of foreign countries.

During a brief question-and-answer session with the press in Iowa, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination expanded to four the list of countries she has publicly charged with waging cyberwarfare that represents a serious commercial and national security threat

"It's not only the Chinese. We know that other governments—Russia, North Korea, Iran—have either directly or indirectly sponsored hacking," the former secretary of State said. "And we worry about terrorist organizations getting access to the capacity."

Clinton—who grabbed headlines over the weekend by assailing China for "trying to hack into everything that doesn't move"—added that legislation to expand the sharing of "cyberthreat data" alone between the government and private sector is not enough to thwart malicious activity.

"We've been trying to get a good plan going forward; we're making a little bit of progress on that in the Congress. It is, for me, not enough," Clinton said. "It doesn't go far enough to try to have better coordination between the public and private sector."

Clinton listed "cumbersome procurement and bureaucratic obstacles within the federal government" as other obstacles inhibiting cybersecurity, referencing the rocky roll-out of HealthCare.gov in 2013 as evidence that government is in need of a technological overhaul that includes a more streamlined process for working with IT contractors.

Clinton did not clarify which specific info-sharing legislation she was referring to, however—or whether it alone would be a useful step forward. Two similar info-sharing bills easily passed the House earlier this year, and a Senate version, known as the Cybersecurity Information Sharing Act, has stalled after clearing the Senate Intelligence Committee on a 14-1 vote. A plan by Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell to attach CISA as an amendment to a defensive authorization bill backfired last month because Democrats refused to support it due to procedural concerns.

Privacy advocates and many computer experts have warned that expanding information-sharing would not do much to prevent or minimize cyberattacks, and that such legislation could actually embolden government surveillance by handing more data over to the National Security Agency.

Government officials have privately pointed to China as the culprit behind a massive data breach of personnel files at the Office of Personnel Management, a hack that has affected millions of current and former federal employees. Some lawmakers have also said China is to blame, although the Obama administration continues to resist accusing Beijing publicly.

Clinton's comments are her most detailed about cybersecurity since officially declaring her White House bid nearly three months ago. She said Tuesday that her concerns about foreign nations hacking the U.S. date back to her tenure as secretary of State.

"It started with the grave concerns that a lot of American businesses had, that their most confidential information was being vacuumed up through intrusive hacking," Clinton said. "It's a serious threat to our commercial interests, to our intelligence interests, to our strategic interests."

Hillary Clinton calls for bankruptcy law change so Puerto Rico can tackle debt // Reuters – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton has joined calls for changes in US bankruptcy laws that would enable Puerto Rico's public entities to restructure some $72bn in debt.

Puerto Rico's 'unpayable' debt: is this the Greece of the western hemisphere?

In Washington, two Democratic senators hope to move forward within weeks with legislation in Congress that would allow the US territory to restructure debts in bankruptcy court, instead of risking chaos.

Governor Alejandro García Padilla of Puerto Rico dropped a bombshell on debt holders a week ago by saying he wanted to restructure debt and postpone bond payments. He urged changes to US bankruptcy laws that currently exclude Puerto Rico.

Like US states, Puerto Rico cannot file for bankruptcy protection. But Puerto Rico's public entities do not have the ability of US municipalities to enlist Chapter 9 of the US bankruptcy code to restructure their debt.

"As a first step, Congress should provide Puerto Rico the same authority that states already have to enable severely distressed government entities, including municipalities and public corporations, to restructure their debts under Chapter 9," Clinton said in a statement given to Reuters.

Puerto Rico has been in a recession for nearly a decade and has an unemployment rate of more than 12% while some 40% of the population lives below the US poverty line, according to government data.

Clinton, a former secretary of state, US senator and first lady, is the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination in the November 2016 presidential election.

Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, both Clinton rivals for the Democratic nomination, have also endorsed easing the bankruptcy laws also for Puerto Rico.

Analysis Colony, state or independence: Puerto Rico's status anxiety adds to debt crisis
The island's classification as a US territory complicates something as simple as bankruptcy filings, prompting many to wonder if statehood is the best option

Residents of Puerto Rico are not entitled to electoral votes for president, but Puerto Ricans make up the second-largest Hispanic origin group in the United States after Mexicans.

A bill proposed by Puerto Rico's non-voting representative in Congress to allow access to Chapter 9 bankruptcy laws stalled in the Republican-run House of Representatives after a hearing in February.

Now Democratic senators Richard Blumenthal of Connecticut and Chuck Schumer of New York are readying a similar bill.

"It's much broader than just Puerto Rico's problem because the bondholders and creditors are on the American mainland and perhaps even throughout the world," Blumenthal told Reuters in an interview.

"A lot of Americans hold these bonds … they are entitled to an orderly and rational process so that they receive the most possible payment as quickly as possible," he said.

A significant number of American mom and pop investors have exposure to Puerto Rico. About 52% of muni open-ended funds are invested in Puerto Rico bonds according to data from Morningstar.

The White House said last week that it did not contemplate a federal bailout but that Congress should examine whether Puerto Rico's government-owned corporations should be able to access Chapter 9 bankruptcy protection.

Blumenthal and Schumer are searching for Republican co-sponsors in the Senate, which like the House has a Republican majority. But some key Republicans seem unimpressed.

"Bankruptcy alone isn't going to solve all of the financial problems Puerto Rico has gotten itself into," said Beth Levine, a spokeswoman for the Senate judiciary committee chairman, Chuck Grassley, an Iowa Republican.

Some creditors are opposed to Chapter 9, fearful that it will weaken their negotiating position and reduce their chances of recovering their money.

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush said in April that he thinks Puerto Rico's public agencies should have the ability to use US bankruptcy laws.

Clinton said "inconsistent and incoherent" application of US federal law had contributed to Puerto Rico's economic situation, and its economy had shrunk in eight of the last nine years.

"One troubling example of this treatment is the lack of equity in federal funding for Puerto Rico under Medicaid and Medicare," Clinton said of the US government healthcare programs.

Clinton Blames 'The Right' For Trust Attacks // NPR // Jessica Taylor – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton worked to paint herself as honest and trustworthy in her first national television interview of the 2016 campaign, blaming Republicans for damaging questions about her time at the State Department and her family's charitable foundation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This has been a theme that has been used against me and my husband for many, many years," the Democratic presidential hopeful told CNN's Brianna Keilar in Iowa, noting that she's been "subjected to the kind of constant barrage of attacks that are largely fomented by and coming from the right."

She added, "[A]t the end of the day, I think voters sort it all out. I have great confidence. I trust the American voter. So I trust the American voter 100 percent, because I think the American voter will weigh these kinds of accusations."

Clinton's honest and trustworthy ratings have taken a hit in recent months. In the most recent CNN poll, nearly 6 in 10 Americans said they didn't believe she was honest and trustworthy. Democrats still maintain a positive view of her, but Republicans believe it will weaken her in a general election.

Some of that skepticism has been fueled by her use of a private email server while at the State Department. Clinton defended that decision, saying she has been transparent in calling for over thousands of emails to be released, the first of which came out last week.

"Let's take a deep breath here," Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, said in the interview. "Everything I did was permitted by law and regulation. I had one device. When I mailed anybody in the government, it would go into the government system. Now, I didn't have to turn over anything. I chose to turn over 55,000 pages, because I wanted to go above and beyond what was expected of me because I knew the vast majority of everything that was official already was in the State Department system."

That echoed much of what Clinton said earlier this year before she got into the presidential campaign.

"This is being blown up with no basis in law or in fact," Clinton continued. "That's fine. I get it. This is being, in effect, used by the Republicans in the Congress."

Clinton also defended the Clinton foundation, which has faced questions about foreign donations accepted while she was secretary of state. Clinton said the work of her husband, former President Bill Clinton, and daughter, Chelsea, should keep going if she wins the presidency.

"I have no plans to say or do anything about the Clinton foundation," she said, "other than to say how proud I am of it and that I think for the good of the world, its work should continue."

Of her chief rival, Vermont independent Sen. Bernie Sanders, Clinton downplayed concern about his rising position in the polls and the record crowds he's been drawing.

On Monday, her communications director, Jennifer Palmieri, acknowledged that the campaign was somewhat "worried" about Sanders.

"First of all, I always thought this would be a competitive race," Clinton said. "So I am happy to have a chance to get out and run my campaign as I see fit and let other candidates do exactly the same."

For those who see shades of her 2008 collapse, Clinton said she's learned a thing or two from that campaign.

"I feel very good about where we are in Iowa," she said of the state where she placed a disappointing third in 2008. "And one of the things that I learned last time is, it's, 'Organize, organize, organize.' And you've got to get people committed. And then they will follow through and then you bring more people."

Clinton also declined to answer whether her economic plan would raise taxes, like Sanders has proposed.

"I'm going to put out my policies, and I'll let other people speak to their policies," she said, "because I think we have to both grow the economy faster and fairer so we have to do what will actually work in the short term, the medium term and the long term. I will be making a speech about my economic proposals on Monday. And then I look forward to the debate about them."

Of her potential Republican rivals — and the possibility of another Bush versus Clinton contest — Clinton demurred, emphasizing that the field is wide open.

"Well, we'll see," she said when asked about running against former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. "That's up to, first, the Republicans on his side, the Democrats on my side. What's great about America is anybody can run for president. That is literally true. And you have to go out and you have to do what everybody else does. You have to make your case. You have to have your agenda. You have to raise the money. You have to work really hard."

She did take a swipe at Bush over immigration, even though he has been hit within the GOP over his openness to reform.

"Well, he doesn't believe in a path to citizenship," Clinton noted. "If he did at one time, he no longer does. And so pretty much they're — as I said, they're on a spectrum of, you know, hostility, which I think is really regrettable in a nation of immigrants like ours, all the way to kind of grudging acceptance but refusal to go with a pathway to citizenship."

And of businessman Donald Trump — who has gotten considerable blowback for his derogatory comments about Mexicans — Clinton criticized her onetime donor.

"I'm very disappointed in those comments," Clinton said, "and I feel very bad and very disappointed with him and with the Republican Party for not responding immediately and saying, 'Enough. Stop it.' "

She continued, trying to paint the GOP with a broad brush against immigrants.

"They are all in the same general area on immigration," Clinton charged. "They don't want to provide a path to citizenship. They range across a spectrum of being either grudgingly welcome or hostile toward immigrants. And I'm going to talk about comprehensive immigration reform. I'm going to talk about all of the good, law-abiding, productive members of the immigrant community that I personally know, that I've met over the course of my life, that I would like to see have a path to citizenship."

Of her own dust-up with the press this weekend after her campaign roped off reporters trying to cover her in a July 4 parade, Clinton defended the decision.

"I just have a different rhythm to my campaign," Clinton said. "I'm not running my campaign for the press. I'm running it for voters. I totally respect the press and what the press has to do. But I wanted — and was determined — to have the time that I needed to actually meet and listen to people."

Hillary Blames GOP for Negative Press, Insists People 'Can and Do' Trust Her // NY Mag //
Margaret Hartmann – July 7, 2015

Since launching her campaign in April, Hillary Clinton has mostly ignored the national press, and her campaign's decision to keep reporters in a rope pen last weekend did not improve their historically dicey relationship. On Tuesday night she tried to smooth things over in her first televised interview as a 2016 candidate. As New York's Annie Lowrey explained when Emailgate first broke, the controversy is likely the result of Clinton trying to avoid bad press: "You loathe the idea of your personal correspondence getting out to a press you consider pathological, so you jury-rig a private email account and end up in the midst of a massive media cluster anyway." But in her interview with CNN's Brianna Keilar, Clinton tried to shift the blame from the media (and herself), pointing instead to her old foe "the vast right-wing conspiracy."

When asked to clarify why she decided to conduct State Department business using her private emails, and delete the emails her staff deemed personal, Clinton said she actually "went above and beyond what anybody could have expected" by turning over more than 55,000 pages to the State Department. "Everything I did was permitted, there was no law, there was no regulation, there was nothing that did not give me the full authority to decide how I was going to communicate," Clinton said. She also alluded to her previous claim that she only wanted to carry one device, saying, "Maybe it was because I am not the most technically capable person and wanted to make it as simple as possible."

Clinton also defended her family's charity, while claiming she played "only a small role" during the "year and a half" she was there (though the name was changed to the Bill, Hillary, and Chelsea Clinton Foundation). "It produced results," Clinton said. "I have no plans to say or do anything about the Clinton foundation other than to say how proud I am of it. I think for the good of the world its work should continue."

It's true, as Clinton noted, that congressional Republicans are running with the scandal accusations, but she painted questions about her trustworthiness as a total fabrication by the right. "I think when you are subjected to the kind of constant barrage of attacks that are largely fomented by and coming from the right ... I think it's understandable that when questions are raised, people maybe are thinking about them and wondering about them," Clinton said. "This has been a theme that has been used against me and my husband for many, many years."

Throughout the interview she was careful to point out that while questions about her credibility are "unfounded," she knows journalists are just doing their job. Recent polls have shown that a majority of Americans do not consider Clinton trustworthy, but when pressed on the issue she said, "Well, people should and do trust me and I have every confidence that that will be the outcome of this election."

Clinton dodged on a question about Senator Bernie Sanders' rising popularity among Democrats. "First of all, I always thought this would be a competitive race," Clinton said. "So I am happy to have a chance to get out and run my campaign as I see fit and let other candidates do exactly the same." However, she was willing to call out some of her potential GOP rivals. She said she was "very disappointed" by Donald Trump's remarks on Mexican immigrants, adding, "I feel very bad and very disappointed with him — and with the Republican party for not responding immediately and saying, 'Enough, stop it.'"

Then she pivoted to attacking the entire GOP field on immigration reform, saying, "They're on a spectrum of hostility, which I think is really regrettable in a nation of immigrants like ours." When asked about Jeb Bush specifically, she said, "He doesn't believe in a path to citizenship. If he did at one time, he no longer does."

"Hillary Clinton will say anything to get elected and her numerous flip-flops on immigration prove it," Bush campaign spokeswoman Emily Benavides responded. "As he outlined in his book on this issue, Gov. Bush believes in a conservative legislative solution to fix our broken immigration system that includes earned legal status for those currently in the country after they pay fines and taxes, learn English and commit no substantial crimes while securing our border."

But as the Miami Herald explains, "citizenship" and "earned legal status" are not the same thing:

Bush has favored citizenship in the past. But in his book Immigration Wars, and recently on the campaign trail, he has instead backed legal status without citizenship, suggesting that might be a more achievable goal given contentious immigration politics.
So Clinton was actually correct, despite what the Bush camp says. Obviously, the GOP isn't solely responsible for persistent questions about the Clintons' ethics, but Hillary does have a point.

Hillary Clinton blames trust issues on GOP // Boston Herald // Hillary Chabot – July 8, 2015

Hillary Clinton blamed Republicans last night for the trustworthiness problem plaguing her, blasting the GOP's "constant barrage of attacks" for negative poll numbers and sidestepping questions about underdog U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders' growing popularity.

"This has been a theme that has been used against me and my husband for many, many years," Clinton said on CNN during her first national interview, adding that the attacks are "largely fomented and coming from the right."

Clinton, who was asked about polling showing Americans question her honesty, said she followed the rules when it came to using a private Internet server at her home during her time as secretary of state.

"Everything I did was permitted," she said, pointing again to the fact that she handed over 55,000 pages of emails. Clinton wiped her server clean, however, and even Democrats have voiced concern about the lax cyber security.

"This is being blown up with no basis in law or in fact," she said, adding, "people should and do trust me."

The veteran pol also brushed aside the surprise success of Democratic rival Sanders, who has been attracting huge crowds while fellow Democrats have attacked Clinton's "excitement problem."

"I always thought this would be a competitive race," was all Clinton would say about Sanders' unexpected popularity. She ducked questions about whether she would raise taxes, saying she plans to release an economic plan on Monday.

Clinton did pounce on recent comments from GOP presidential candidate Donald Trump that illegal immigrants from Mexico are "rapists." "I'm very disappointed in those comments and I feel very bad and very disappointed with him and with the Republican Party for not responding immediately and saying, 'Enough, stop it,' " she said, adding that Republican candidates Jeb Bush and others are "in the same general area on immigration."

Bush immediately struck back.

"Hillary Clinton will say anything to get elected and her numerous flip-flops on immigration prove it," said Bush spokeswoman Emily Benavides.

Clinton also brushed off recent concerns that she has kept the media — and the public — at arm's length. Her comments come after she kept reporters trying to cover her in New Hampshire in a roped-off pen.

"I'm not running my campaign for the press. I'm running it for the voters," she said. "I spent the first 90 days getting my feel for what was going on in the country ... obviously I'll be doing a lot more press."

of State and pushed back at suggestions she is distrusted by large portions of the public in her inaugural national TV interview as a 2016 presidential candidate.

Clinton moved back and forth from offense to defense during the approximately 20-minute interview, saving her strongest comments for GOP candidate Donald Trump, whose assertions that illegal immigrants from Mexico were “rapists” bringing drugs and crime to the U.S. have created a political firestorm.

“I’m very disappointed in those comments, and I feel very bad and very disappointed with him and with the Republican Party for not responding immediately and saying, ‘Enough, stop it,’ ” the Democratic front-runner told CNN’s Brianna Keilar, who scored the interview.

Clinton also criticized former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush’s approach to immigration, linking him and the rest of the GOP field to Trump.

“Well, he doesn’t believe in a path to citizenship. If he did at one time, he no longer does. And so pretty much they’re … on a spectrum of, you know, hostility … all the way to kind of grudging acceptance but refusal to go with a pathway to citizenship.”

The remarks were clearly a play for the support of Hispanic voters, with whom the Democratic Party has enjoyed a considerable advantage in recent presidential elections.

The most tense moments of the interview — and Clinton’s most defensive tone — came when Keilar asked her about her use of a private email server during her time at the State Department.

Clinton insisted that that “everything I did was permitted” and that “I didn’t have to turn over anything.”

Under further challenge from Keilar, Clinton shot back: “You know, you’re starting with so many assumptions. … Again, let’s take a deep breath here. Everything I did was permitted by law and regulation. I had one device. When I mailed anybody in the government, it would go into the government system.”

On the broader issue of her trustworthiness, Clinton sought to dismiss recent polls that show a large number of voters saying she’s dishonest. She blamed the “constant barrage of attacks,” which she said had “largely been fomented by, and coming from, the right,” for dragging her numbers down.

“I have every confidence that during the course of this campaign, people will know who will fight for them when they need them, and that’s the person who I am and what I will do if I am president,” she said.

At another point she insisted starkly: “People should and do trust me.”

Clinton repeatedly alluded to “unfounded” attacks against her, but didn’t specify which attacks she believed were unfair. She did appear to allude at one point to the book Clinton Cash, which alleges her family’s foundation took millions of dollars from foreign entities that could have benefited from decisions she made at the State Department.

“People write books filled with these kinds of unsubstantiated attacks and even admit they have no evidence, but of course it’s your job to cover it so of course it’s going to raise questions in people’s minds,” Clinton said to Keilar. “But during the course of this campaign, just as in my two prior campaigns, I have a lot of confidence that the American people can sort it all out.”

Clinton fiercely defended the Clinton Foundation but sought to diminish the time she spent there, saying she played a “very small role” over the course of about “a year and a half.”

“It produced results,” Clinton said. “I have no plans to say or do anything about the Clinton Foundation other than to say how proud I am of it and that I think for the good of the world its work should continue.”

Clinton took a question about the rise of Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders (I) in stride, saying she “always thought this would be a competitive race.”

Sanders, her closest rival for the Democratic nomination, has been attracting huge crowds to his events and eroding Clinton’s massive leads in the early-voting states of Iowa and New Hampshire. On Monday, Clinton communications director Jennifer Palmieri called Sanders “a serious force” that her team is worried about.

But on Tuesday, Clinton touted the strength of her organization in Iowa, where she continues to lead Sanders by more than 20 points, according to the RealClearPolitics average of polls.

“I feel very good about where we are in Iowa. We are signing up thousands of volunteers, people committed to caucus for us. We have a committed supporter in every one of the 1,600 precincts, and one of things that I learned last time is ... organize, organize, organize," Clinton said. "You've got to get people committed and then you bring more people. So I feel very good about where my campaign is."

Clinton's 2008 bid for the presidency went into a tailspin from which it never really recovered after she finished third in the Iowa caucuses behind then-rivals Barack Obama and John Edwards.

Clinton voices support for deported Iowa im migrant // The Des Moines Register // T ony Leys – July 7, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Tuesday took up the cause of an Iowa City immigrant who was deported over a 16-year-old misdemeanor conviction.

During a campaign stop here, Clinton referred to the controversial case of Max Villatoro, a Mennonite pastor-in-training who was arrested at his home on March 3 and wound up being deported to his native Honduras. The case has gained widespread attention from immigration-reform advocates, who say Villatoro, 41, was an upstanding member of the community unjustly ripped away from his family.

Clinton agreed with a Villatoro supporter, who said federal authorities should have used their discretion not to deport him. She noted that the deportation was based on a misdemeanor charge from the 1990s. "He was from all accounts, everything I've read and heard, a contributing member of the community. And for the life of me, I don't understand why he was deported," she said. "And I would think we would have to take a hard look at cases like that and exercise more discretion."

She credited the Obama administration with making progress on the issue, but said she would push for more movement toward reforming the country's broken immigration system. "I still think we should deport dangerous people, dangerous criminals — they should be gone," she said. "But for people who have maybe one small blemish on their record, and they've proven over the years since that they are contributing citizens, I think we should show them understanding and permit them and their families to stay together."

Federal authorities have defended Villatoro's deportation, saying it was a legitimate part of a sweep of unauthorized immigrants who'd committed crimes. His lawyer has said the charge stemmed from an attempt to gain a driver's license.

Clinton's remarks on the case came in response to a question from Aliese Gingerich, 22, of Iowa City. Gingerich said afterward that she has been working on immigration advocacy in Iowa and when she went to college in Pennsylvania.

She was glad to hear Clinton address the issue. "I think it's heartening that she is saying that she wants to pass comprehensive immigration reform and work hard with bipartisan efforts that she cited, and things she's done in the past. I would really like to hear a little bit more specifically what she wants to pass exactly."

The Iowa City stop was one of two Clinton scheduled in Iowa Tuesday on her fourth trip to the state since she announced her candidacy in April. It was only the second event so far that was open to the general public, and it was the first one at which she took questions from unscreened voters.

The audience questions focused on issues such as the use of military force, how to expand and protect the Affordable Care Act and how to improve education. On the education question, Clinton stressed that she wants the country to get away from over-reliance on standardized tests and uniform instruction methods. "We have a broad range of kids. We can't teach them all the same way," she said.

More than 350 people got into Clinton's event Tuesday at the Iowa City public library, but scores more failed to get in because of a lack of space.

Iowa City is known as the most liberal spot in Iowa. That could make it prime territory for Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, a populist who is mounting a surprisingly strong Democratic challenge on Clinton's left flank. He has been rising in the polls and drawing crowds in the thousands in Iowa and other states.

Clinton told reporters after her event Tuesday that she was not surprised to see Sanders have some success.

"This is going to be competitive, and it should be competitive," she said. "It's only the presidency of the United States we're talking about. So, you know, the more the better. Let's get everybody out there, let's get everybody working hard, running their own campaigns and then we'll leave it up to Iowa to decide what happens."

Several voters who came to Clinton's Iowa City event said they like what Sanders says, especially on the issue of income inequality. But they also are skeptical of his ability to win the general election.

"In a perfect world, yes, I would support him, but I'm not going to throw my vote away," said Tom Braverman, 51, of Iowa City, who is a special-education teacher. He said that if Democrats nominated Sanders, they would be making the same kind of mistake Republicans will make if they nominate a far-right candidate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The library meeting room the campaign chose for the event only held a few hundred people. Far more than that came to the library Tuesday morning, hoping to see Clinton. At one point, the line outside stretched more than two blocks.

Undecided voter Shawn Harmsen, 42, of Iowa City, said he had hoped to ask Clinton a question in person. He stood about two hours in line, but was more than a third of the way back. "For the people who get in, it'll be great," he said of the relatively small venue. "But for those who don't get in — will they come back next time?"

Peg Voelker, 53, of Iowa City, stood about two-thirds of the way back in line. About a half hour before the event started, she said she realized she probably wouldn't get in to see Clinton. "But we're glad to stand in line to show our support," she said. Even if she didn't get in this time, she said, she would be back for future Clinton events and would volunteer for the candidate.

Voelker, who is self-employed, said she supported Democratic rival John Edwards when Clinton ran for the nomination in 2008. She was afraid then that Clinton would be unable to withstand relentless personal attacks by opponents. But she now believes the attacks have allowed Clinton to show her true colors. "She has a proven track record of standing up and being productive no matter what they throw at her," said Voelker.

After the Iowa City event, Clinton headed to Ottumwa for a private "house party" with supporters.

Clinton campaign adds 20 paid Iowa staffers // The Des Moines Reigister // Jennifer Jacobs – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton has hired 20 more field organizers to campaign for her in Iowa, and they started work Tuesday, a spokeswoman told the Des Moines Register.

"A top flight organizing staff is critical to winning the caucus and we're excited to add to the team that has been on the ground for nearly three months," Clinton's Iowa director, Matt Paul, told the Register in a statement.

Clinton, a former U.S. secretary of state, is in Iowa Tuesday for her fourth visit to the first-in-the-nation voting state since she formally announced her candidacy April 12. She was scheduled to do events in Iowa City and Ottumwa.

Lily Adams, the campaign's Iowa spokeswoman, declined to reveal the total number of Iowa staff, which includes a team of strategists based in Des Moines, but said the 20 hires join the existing team of 21 field organizers and six regional organizing directors on the ground since April.

All 47 are paid, Adams said.

The field staffers are focused on organizing down to the precinct level, doing one-on-one meetings with activists, county chairs and Iowans who have never caucused before, as well as organize house parties and attend local Democratic events. They use commitment cards to secure pledges to caucus for Clinton on Feb. 1.

The Clinton campaign also has more than 100 unpaid "organizing fellows." Aides said they got more than 1,000 applications for the summertime Iowa Organizing Fellowship program, meant to teach the full-time volunteers organizing strategies and help Clinton bring voters into the fold.

Late last month, a woman chosen to be a fellow in the state of Nevada publicly criticized Clinton for not paying her interns.

"Forget arguments about raising the minimum wage. I can't even get a wage," Carolyn Osorio wrote in an opinion piece published by USA Today.

"Finding out that Hillary perpetuates the exploitation known as unpaid internships was like discovering that Santa wasn't real," Osorio wrote. In response, the Clinton team said campaigns in both parties have used volunteer interns in the past.

Eight of the 20 additional Iowa hires already had unpaid jobs with the campaign, Adams said Tuesday.

The Clinton team has been completing the process of hiring the 20 organizers since early June, Adams said. Their first day on the job was Tuesday, when they began two days of training in Des Moines. They will then be deployed across Iowa this weekend, she said.

Paul said the the campaign has been preparing for competition in the Iowa caucuses since Clinton announced her candidacy in April.

"As we've said from the beginning," Paul said, "we are taking nothing for granted in the caucus and these organizers will increase our campaign's ability to work with supporters in every neighborhood and precinct to get the word out about Hillary Clinton's campaign to fight for everyday Americans."

The Clintons' headache is back: First brother Roger was paid $100,000 to influence Bill and ex-president bought him house despite IRS demand for his property // The Daily Mail // Francesca Chambers – July 7, 2015

Bill Clinton's half brother Roger, nicknamed 'headache' by the Secret Service during Clinton's presidency, has tried to keep a low-profile as his sister-in-law Hillary positions her family to move back into the White House.

But now it is revealed today that he used his brother-in-law's name to win a $100,000 consulting contract with a company looking to build houses in Haiti.
And it is also disclosed that he is living in a home that was partly - if not fully - paid for by Bill through a limited liability company registered to the Clintons' family home in Chappaqua, New York.

The use of such a device was described as having the potential to 'raise eyebrows' with the IRS. It was never disclosed by Hillary during her time in office that address was linked to the limited liability company.

Now it is revealed today that Roger, pictured here in 2013, used his brother-in-law's name to win a $100,000 consulting contract with a company looking to build houses in Haiti

Roger Clinton's antics in the '90s were a constant source of embarrassment for the first family, culminating in a 2001 congressional investigation over his attempts to 'cash in' on his connections to the White House.

The wannabee rock star, who went to prison in 1985 for cocaine abuse and for a time played in a band called Politics, was found to have engaged in 'serious and reckless misconduct' the review panel.

He has resurfaced just as Hillary tries to put a troubled start to her campaign for presidency behind her with her first television interview of her candidacy.

Roger currently lives in Los Angeles, California, on an $857,000 property he told the New York Times that he co-owns '50-50' with Bill, whom he calls 'Big Brother.'Roger
'I put 50 percent of the money into it,' Roger, 58, told the publication during an interview, conducted at his home.

As the Times points out, if true, that could prove legally problematic for the younger Clinton because he owed the California and federal governments more than $100,000 in unpaid taxes and the IRS was to acquire any 'property now owned or later acquired' by him.

The house was purchased in 2009. It says the liens were removed in 2010 and 2011. If Roger did help purchase the property, that would constitute tax evasion.

'If I was still working at the I.R.S. and someone came to me with this, it would raise eyebrows and trigger me to dig further to find out what exactly was going on,' David Holtz, a former IRS litigator who lives in Los Angeles, told the Times.

A source familiar with the situation told the publication, however, that Bill Clinton purchased the property through a LLC so that his brother and his teenage nephew would have a place to live but he would not be personally responsible for the home as he would not be living in it.

It's possible that Roger Clinton could have contributed to the purchase of the home but it is not clear how he would have done that given that the Times found no sustained record of income for him since, other than the $5,000-a-month deal with Living Modular, the company seeking to build low-cost homes in Haiti.

That deal itself raised questions as the man behind it suggested Roger Clinton promised to deliver a contract with his brother's foundation.

'I paid Roger $100,000,' businessman Wayne Coleman said. 'Basically, he promised to get us a contract through the Clinton Foundation for a project over there. What he was really trying to do was sell the influence of his brother.'

Roger was successful in getting the companies' model included in an expo that Bill Clinton attended on behalf of The Clinton Foundation.

His brother did not choose to invest in the company's product, though - a decision Roger talked up to 'lawyers and advisers' rather than his brother, whom he said 'loved' the effort.

'You had all this government grant money, and all this money Bill was raising from around the world for reconstruction,' he told the Times. 'But we just couldn't make it happen. It's like, come on, man, can't you just throw me a bone?'

Roger Clinton said that 'seven out of 10 times' being related to Bill and Hillary worked against him when trying to win major contracts because it would be interpreted as nepotism.

'I don't have a choice of being first brother,' Clinton lamented. 'It's not like I've been given the option of doing it and I could turn it down. There are times when it's hard.'

Sources who spoke to the Times said that Roger and his family have long benefited from his big brother's monetary success in other ways, though.

Bill Clinton reportedly paid for Roger's grown-up daughter to attend cosmetology school.

And, after leaving the White House, when he worked at investment firm Yucaipa, Bill Clinton is said by a former employee to have regularly written his brother checks.
On another occasion, Roger's lawyer floated paying out a settlement over a domestic dispute involving two women on Clinton's property with Bill's money.

Bill and Hillary Clinton's siblings have been accused on numerous occasions of trying to profit off of their relationships with the political power couple, and usually inappropriately.

Hillary's older brother Hugh pocketed $400,000 from a Democratic Party donor - that he was later forced to give back - after he successfully lobbied Bill to commute the federal prison sentence of the donor's drug-dealing son.

Her younger brother, Tony Rodham, also convinced Bill to grant a presidential pardon that he said he wasn't paid to lobby for but a congressional investigation later found that he was.

He's continued to ride the coattails of his brother-in-law, using The Clinton Foundation as a means to an ends of his own contracts in Haiti.

Hillary Clinton to pay 'summer fellows' after reports of interns working for free // The Guardian // Ben Jacobs – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton has hired eight "summer fellows" as full-time paid staffers, just weeks after the Guardian revealed that the presidential frontrunner's campaign was using experienced political operatives as unpaid interns.

The Clinton campaign is adding 20 full-time field organizers in Iowa, seeking to increase her presence and rally Democrats in the crucial caucus state, which she visited on Tuesday as her team acknowledged fears of a better-than-expected showing from the independent challenger Bernie Sanders.

As first reported by the Des Moines Register, eight of those new hires had previously served as full-time "organizing fellows". In that capacity, fellows performed almost identical duties to field organizers, who do the most basic work on a campaign: recruiting volunteers and endorsements, going door-to-door and calling voters, often outside the confines of a 9-to-5 day job.

Now, those people will be paid, the Clinton campaign confirmed to the Guardian on Tuesday.

Clinton already had a sizeable footprint on the ground in Iowa and launched her campaign with roughly 40 staffers in the state, but the new wave of hires represents a decisive step by Clinton to build up her organizing efforts in the state.

The former secretary of state returned to Iowa on Tuesday for the first time since the opening week of her campaign, speaking to supporters and organizers in Iowa City ahead of her first sit-down interview since announcing her second run for the White House.

The push to woo ardent Iowa Democrats comes amid a surge of progressive appeal from Sanders, the Vermont senator who has been surging in recent polls and more than doubled his support among Democrats in the state between May and June, according to a Quinnipiac University's survey.

"We are worried about him," the Clinton communications director, Jennifer Palmieri, said of Sanders on MSNBC on Monday. "He will be a serious force for the campaign, and I don't think that will diminish."

The Iowa hires, however, represent the continuation of a trend in Clintonland that new staffers – no matter how much political experience they may bring from previous campaigns – initially must work for free before getting on the Clinton payroll.

Many high-ranking staffers worked for free as "volunteers" on the Clinton campaign in the weeks before she formally launched her campaign in early April. Political watchers told the Guardian last month it represented an attempt to wiggle around federal campaign-finance rules that ban an undeclared campaign from paying staff.

When Federal Election Commission reports are released next week, Clinton's donations are expected to far exceed any other Democratic candidate.

Clinton's competitors have already taken jabs at her use of the unpaid fellows: Lis Smith, the deputy campaign manager for former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, tweeted over the Independence Day weekend that "we all know she doesn't pay young staff".

Still, Clinton has been polling well above 50% in the state where she finished third in the 2008 Democratic caucus.

Clinton Still Far Outpaces Her Democratic Rivals // Rasmussen Reports – July 7, 2015

Despite the increasing media coverage going to some of her rivals for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, Hillary Clinton remains hugely ahead as far as the party's voters are concerned.

Ninety-three percent (93%) of Likely Democratic Voters believe Clinton is likely to end up being their party's nominee next year, according to a new Rasmussen Reports national telephone survey. That includes 60% who say it is Very Likely. Just five percent (5%) disagree, with only one percent (1%) who think a Clinton nomination is Not At All Likely. The survey of 1,000 Likely Voters was conducted on July 2 and 5, 2015 by Rasmussen Reports. The margin of sampling error is +/- 3 percentage points with a 95% level of confidence. Field work for all Rasmussen Reports surveys is conducted by Pulse Opinion Research, LLC. See methodology.

Hillary Clinton: People who dis the government are 'dissing our democracy' // The Washington Times // Jessica Chasmar – July 7, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton said Tuesday that while skepticism of government is "part of our DNA" as Americans, people who openly "dis" the government are effectively "dissing our democracy."

"When people dis the government — we're really dissing ourselves and dissing our democracy," she told supporters in Iowa City, The Hill reported. "This is my last rodeo, and I believe that we can leave not just the country in good shape for the future, but we can get a deep bench of young people to decide that they want to go into politics."

Mrs. Clinton explained, however, that it's "perfectly fine" to be skeptical of the government, and that it's "part of our DNA," The Hill reported.

"I want people's lives to be better when I finish as your president than when I started," she added.

Clinton hits on local issues in Iowa City campaign stop // KCRG // Mark Carlson – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton made a campaign stop at the Iowa City Public Library Tuesday afternoon in which she touched on meth use in Iowa, the Coral Ridge Mall shooting and several other local issues.

Clinton brought up the recent shooting at the mall before making brief comments on gun control.

She also brought up meth use and the recent closing of the Mount Pleasant Mental Health Institute while discussing her concerns about mental health and drug use in America.

Clinton said she is fully invested in her run for President.

"I've been called many things," Clinton said. "Quitter is not one of them. I will not quit on you, I will fight for you."

A couple hundred people packed into a library meeting room to hear from the former Secretary of State and First Lady.

Will Hillary Clinton swear off fossil-fuel money? Bernie Sanders already has // Grist // John Light – July 7, 2015

The Nation magazine and 350 Action are challenging presidential candidates to "neither solicit nor accept campaign contributions" from fossil fuel companies — and that's putting the heat on Hillary Clinton in particular.

"Back in the 1990s, politicians on both sides of the aisle swore off campaign contributions from big tobacco because the industry lied to the American people about the damage it was causing to public health," writes 350 Action spokesperson Jamie Henn in an email. Oil, coal, and gas companies, Henn continues, "have consistently misled the public about the dangers associated with their product, and this time it's the whole planet that's at stake. You can't be serious about addressing climate change and still accept checks from ExxonMobil."

Fossil fuel companies, of course, exercise quite a bit of influence over politics through their ability to lob money into campaigns. Though coal companies' profits have been suffering, oil companies are going strong, and both still put a lot of money into politics. The oil and gas industry poured $76 million into federal campaigns in 2012, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Of the amount that was donated to individual candidates' campaigns, 89 percent went to Republicans and 11 percent to Democrats. The coal mining industry gave another $15 million in 2012, and most of the candidates it supported were Republicans too.

So The Nation's editors issued a challenge to candidates in an editorial yesterday:

To break the carbon barons' grip over America's response to this crisis, The Nation calls upon all 2016 presidential and congressional candidates to make and honor the following pledge: In the name of protecting our country and the world from the growing dangers of climate change, I will neither solicit nor accept campaign contributions from any oil, gas, or coal company.

It's an interesting experiment, and how candidates choose to respond to it says a lot about their priorities. "Some candidates for president are already signing up," writes Henn, "and we expect more to do so as campaigns like divestment continue to stigmatize the fossil fuel industry."

Democrat Bernie Sanders and the Green Party's Jill Stein have said they're in — they'll take the pledge. Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley and former Rhode Island governor and U.S. senator Lincoln Chafee — also both running as Democrats — "said they supported strong climate action but would not sign the pledge," write the magazine's editors in the editorial. [UPDATE, 7/7/15: O'Malley now tells The Nation that he will take the pledge.] Nation Executive Editor Richard Kim told Grist that they're reaching out to Jim Webb, former senator from Virginia, who jumped into the race as a Democrat last week.

On the other side, not one of the 14 Republican candidates The Nation contacted has responded to the challenge. All but one of the Republicans deny that human-made climate change is a real threat that should be taken seriously by our next president. The one outlier, Sen. Lindsey Graham (S.C.), has said he's in favor of addressing "climate change [and] CO_2 emissions in a business-friendly way," but he's a long-shot candidate. And, well, it honestly doesn't seem too likely that Republicans, whose party has embraced the "money is speech"-type decisions from the Supreme Court that paved the way for the current explosion in campaign spending, would say no on principle to money from a big industry — especially when the donor industry in question so clearly favors Republicans over their Democratic opponents.

That puts the pressure from The Nation and 350 Action's challenge on Hillary Clinton.

Clinton, who has yet to respond to the challenge, has acknowledged that climate change is a potent threat. Were she to win, she'd be following another Democratic president who, at least on the demand side of things, has pushed to green America's energy economy, and who has worked internationally to encourage other large polluting countries to do the same. Climate change is an issue she'll have to engage with continually through the election cycle, and oil and coal companies' objectives are, presumably, at odds with those of a candidate who has called for "decisive" action to "head off the most catastrophic consequences" of climate change.

So will Clinton heed this latest effort to push her to the left? Her campaign has started to see Sanders as a real threat, and it's attempting to emulate his campaign by courting small donors. Choosing to turn down money from companies with a vested interest in stopping climate action is one easy way Clinton could show her commitment to the liberal base.

The Nation and 350 Action plan to keep up the pressure, on Clinton and the other candidates who haven't pledged yet. "After all, candidates can change their minds," the Nation editors write, "especially when enough public pressure is brought to bear."

Judicial Watch: Federal Judge Orders State Department to Release Documents Regarding Hillary Clinton's iPhone and iPad Use // Judicial Watch – July 7, 2015

Judicial Watch announced today that a federal judge has ordered the State Department to begin releasing documents by August 2015 regarding former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's requests for use of an iPad and iPhone. The order comes in response to a Judicial Watch lawsuit (Judicial Watch, Inc. v. U.S. Department of State (No. 1:15-cv-00646)) seeking documents related to Clinton's use of an iPhone and iPad to conduct official business while secretary of state.

In her ruling, Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly required the State Department to produce the first round of relevant documents by August 20, 2015, and held that Judicial Watch and the State Department will be responsible for filing a joint status report by September 1, 2015, "…proposing a schedule for further productions and indicating the volume and scope of responsive documents." Beginning August 20, the State Department will also be required to release new documents every six weeks.

Though the State Department did not object to producing records beginning in August, Judge Kollar-Kotelly denied the State Department's request to set January 2016 as the final document production date, holding:

The Court will not set a final deadline for all productions until after it has had an opportunity to consider that Joint Status Report—in order to leave open the possibility that the production of documents can be completed more expeditiously than the January 2016 deadline proposed by the Defendant.

In the most recent report to the court, Judicial Watch opposed the State Department's request to extend final production through January 2016.

Judicial Watch filed the lawsuit after the Department of State failed to comply with Judicial Watch's March 10, 2015, Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request seeking release of the following:

Any and all records of requests by former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton or her staff to the State Department Office Security Technology seeking approval for the use of an iPad or iPhone for official government business; and

Any and all communications within or between the Office of the Secretary of State, the Executive Secretariat, and the Office of the Secretary and the Office of Security Technology concerning, regarding, or related to the use of unauthorized electronic devices for official government business.

On March 31, 2015, The Associated Press reported that Clinton, while secretary of state, had used an iPad to email members of her staff, contradicting her statements that she had used a secret email account so that she could conveniently conduct official business on one electronic device alone. Reports of Clinton's use of both a secret email server based at her residence and of an iPad to conduct government business have also raised concerns about the security of Clinton's communications.

"The federal courts are doing a significant service to the American people by ordering the State Department to release documents regarding Mrs. Clinton's iPhone and iPad use," said Judicial Watch President Tom Fitton. "Rather than admitting that it unlawfully, obstructed the public's right to know for years and start producing records, the Obama administration has stonewalled and fought Judicial Watch in court. Can there be any other explanation for these violations of transparency and other laws, some which may include criminal liability, than Hillary Clinton and the Obama administration don't want the American people to learn embarrassing truths?"

Hillary Clinton to visit Michigan July 21 // The Detroit News // David Shepardson – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton is making her first trip to Michigan since announcing she is running for president.

The former secretary of state and first lady will headline a fundraiser July 21 at the Grosse Pointe home of David Katz and Jill Alper, according to a copy of the invitation obtained by The Detroit News on Tuesday.

The fundraiser will cost $2,700. To be an "event co-host," a person must raise $27,000 — "includes host reception with Hillary and membership in Hillstarters program."

To be an event host, a person must raise $50,000 and that "includes host reception with Hillary and membership in Hillraisers program."

Last month, a group of women in Michigan met to tout Clinton's candidacy.

O'Malley expresses distaste for super PACs after one backing him attacks Sanders // WaPo // John Wagner – July 7, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley said that he would prefer there were no super PACs when asked in a radio interview Tuesday about one backing him that recently produced Web ads attacking rival Bernie Sanders.

"Once you're a candidate, you're in a bit of a straight jacket," O'Malley, the former Maryland governor, said during an interview with New Hampshire Public Radio's Morning Edition. "I would hope that we would keep this debate a debate about the issues, and I would prefer, not that I'm able to tell a super PAC what to do, I would prefer that we didn't have any super PACs, frankly."

The ads in question, produced by the group Generation Forward, attacked Sanders, a Vermont senator, for his mixed record on gun control, asserting that he is "no progressive" on that issue. The ads were targeted to Web viewers in Iowa, the nation's first presidential caucus state.

Generation Forward is run by allies of O'Malley, including a family friend and a former press aide. Federal law limits coordination between declared candidates and independent groups set up to work for their election. Super PACs, which can take unlimited contributions, have flourished in the wake of the 2010 Supreme Court decision known as Citizens United.

Sanders has urged his allies not to form a super PAC and is one of the few 2016 presidential candidates without one.

In recent weeks, Sanders has jumped in the polls in both Iowa and New Hampshire, emerging as the leading alternative to Democratic frontrunner Hillary Rodham Clinton, while O'Malley's campaign has remained stalled in the low single digits.

During the radio interview that aired Tuesday, O'Malley also elaborated on his characterization of Sanders last week as a "protest candidate" in an interview with The Washington Post.

"History has shown usually the candidates that are surging in the summer are not the candidates who are surging in the primary," O'Malley said.

He made his comments in advance of a planned trip Wednesday and Thursday to New Hampshire, the nation's first presidential primary state. O'Malley has appearances scheduled in Manchester, Derry, Concord and Wolfeboro.

Martin O'Malley racked up $339,200 in loans putting two kids through college. He wants to lighten the load for others. // WaPo // John Wagner – July 7, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley plans Wednesday to put forward an ambitious five-year goal of allowing students to graduate debt-free from public colleges and universities across the country.

The proposition is deeply personal for O'Malley: Aides say he and his wife have already incurred $339,200 in loans to put the two eldest of their four children through private universities. And college affordability was a leading priority for O'Malley during his tenure as Maryland's governor.

The issue is one being talked about a lot these days by Democrats, including the party's other White House candidates, as more and more students enter the workforce with hefty debt loads.

O'Malley, who plans to detail his plan during a morning event in New Hampshire, will call on states to freeze tuition rates at public colleges and universities -- as Maryland did for four years -- and propose other measures that would help those carrying debt.

Under O'Malley's plan, a copy of which was shared with The Washington Post, students and parents would be able to refinance their debt at lower interest rates. And O'Malley would base the repayment terms for student borrowers on their income upon graduation.

For the long term, O'Malley says he would set a goal of limiting college tuition to 10 percent of a state's median income at four-year institutions and 5 percent at two-year institutions. Federal matching grants would help states that participate in reaching the goal.

Under his plan, O'Malley would also increase Pell Grants and revamp federal work-study programs to help cover non-tuition costs, such as room and board.

Aides declined to spell out the cost of O'Malley's initiatives but suggested they could be paid for by measures such as closing corporate tax loopholes and taxing capital gains at the same rate as earned income.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who's emerged as the leading alternative for the Democratic nomination to Hillary Rodham Clinton, has proposed a grander idea: making four-year public colleges and universities free. His plan, which he estimates would cost $70 billion a year, would be paid for in part by a tax on Wall Street transactions by investments houses, hedge funds and other speculators.

Clinton is also expected to detail college affordability plans in coming months.

In recent years, O'Malley's daughter Grace, 24, graduated from Georgetown University, and another daughter, Tara, 23, graduated from College of Charleston. Aides said O'Malley and his wife, a district court judge in Baltimore, have taken out nine loans totaling $339,200 to help pay for the education of their oldest two children. The interest rates range from just over 6 percent to 8.5 percent, an aide said.

While some provisions in O'Malley's plan would not affect private universities, O'Malley aides said those schools would have an incentive to keep costs down as public colleges and universities become more affordable.

In an e-mail sent to O'Malley supporters on Tuesday, Grace O'Malley, now a public school teacher in Baltimore, relayed her college-tuition story and urged others to do so on a Web page set up by her father's campaign.

"I had to make a tough choice: do I go to the college we can afford or do I take out loans to go to the college of my dreams?" she wrote. "At the age of 18, I made the decision to follow my dreams. My family and I now face years of debt -- and we know we're not the only ones."

Martin O'Malley Calls For Debt-Free College Within 5 Years // HuffPo // Tyler Kingkade – July 7, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley on Wednesday will lay out a plan providing debt-free access to a college degree for all students within five years. The former Maryland governor also will propose income-based repayment options for borrowers who have private student loans.

O'Malley will unveil his higher education plans during an event Wednesday morning in Manchester, New Hampshire. He will seek to cut tuition "to no more than 10 percent of state median income at four-year public universities," and encourage "competency-based education strategies" that allow students to graduate quicker, according to campaign briefing documents. To cut non-tuition costs, O'Malley will propose expanding Pell grants and tripling the work-study program so that at least 2 million students can participate.

Debt-free college has already become a major issue in the Democratic presidential race, with endorsements of the idea from Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. The issue has snowballed, thanks in part to a push by progressive activists, as student debt tops $1.2 trillion.

The idea was outlined in a white paper by the left-leaning think tank Progressive Change Campaign Committee, and has steadily gained steam among Democrats.

Debt-free college "should be one of the top issues talked about on the campaign trail, in debates, in TV ads, and at the doors with voters of all ages," said Adam Green, Progressive Change Campaign Committee co-founder, insisting that such a plan would be a boon for the economy.

O'Malley's plan builds on his previous statements and follows Sen. Elizabeth Warren's (D-Mass.) framework for debt-free college.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley's daughter, Grace O'Malley, sent an email to campaign supporters Tuesday mentioning that her family chose to take out student loans to finance college. O'Malley's family has $339,200 worth of Parent Plus loans for their two daughters' college educations, campaign aides said.

New Hampshire has consistently ranked near the top for states with the most student debt.

To address current debt, O'Malley will propose allowing borrowers with private student loans to enroll in income-based repayment plans. Details aren't yet being released, but aides said borrowers would enroll in a program that would essentially have them paying the government rather than banks.

The Obama administration has rolled out programs for federal student loans that tie payments to borrowers' income. But no similar benefit exists for private loans. As a result, private student loan borrowers' monthly paymentscan top $1,000, and there's no loan forgiveness programs. Private student loans make up about one-eighth of all national education debt.

O'Malley will call on states to freeze tuition at state colleges and universities and to restore funding to higher education, which has been slashed for decades. He wants to encourage higher education funding with federal grants in a process still being worked out.

"The cost would vary depending on states' levels of funding, but we have to take the burden off students and their families and go back to historical levels of investment in our public institutions of higher ed," campaign spokesman Sean Savett said Tuesday. "Governor O'Malley is considering a number of possible ways to cover the cost including closing the trust fund and carried interest loopholes, taxing capital gains at the same rate as earned income, and closing tax loopholes for corporations that ship jobs overseas."

O'Malley to Lay Out Plan for Debt-Free College // AP // July 8, 2015

CONCORD, N.H. — Democrat Martin O'Malley is calling the high cost of college a "crisis" as he lays out a goal of debt-free tuition for all students at public colleges and universities within five years if elected president.

O'Malley, a former governor of Maryland, will outline his plan Wednesday at an event in the early-voting state of New Hampshire. O'Malley is struggling to catch fire with Democratic voters who are preoccupied with rivals Hillary Rodham Clinton and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders.

Focusing on college costs could help him make inroads with younger voters in New Hampshire, where the average student loan debt burden is the highest in the nation. But he's not alone in addressing the problem. Sanders is calling for free college tuition and has introduced legislation in the Senate to tax financial transactions to pay for it. Clinton has emphasized the need to lower college costs but has yet to be specific on policy.

Roughly a dozen voters will share their struggles with student debt in a discussion with O'Malley before he outlines his debt-free college plan.

O'Malley's plan relies in part on using federal matching dollars to encourage states to pursue some of his more ambitious goals, such as freezing tuition rates and eventually reducing tuition at four-year public schools to 10 percent of states' median incomes.

The plan calls on states to invest more money in higher education and maintain those levels even as tuition goes down. New Hampshire invests minimally in its public colleges and universities, and state aid for higher education is often on the chopping block in tight state budgets.

O'Malley's plan includes familiar policy ideas, such as allowing students to refinance their loans and automatically enrolling people in income-based repayment plans.

He is also proposing an increase in Pell Grants and a tripling of the number of work-study jobs to help students cover college costs beyond tuition, such as room and board.

Martin O'Malley Has the Right Solution for Puerto Rico's Debt Crisis // The Nation // John Nichols – July 7, 2015

Puerto Rico is not Greece.

But the United States commonwealth is confronted with a debt crisis. It faces the threat of a brutal round of austerity cuts, which could make a bad circumstance dramatically worse. If ever there was a moment that called for enlightened leadership that recognizes both the economic and social challenges facing the Puerto Rico, this is it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley heard that call as the crisis began to come into focus last month and declared, "As a nation we must help our fellow US citizens not only because it's the right thing to do, but because our region's economic stability depends on it."

Urging the Obama administration and Congress to act "to avoid Puerto Rico's economic collapse," O'Malley said:

First, Puerto Rico should be able to negotiate with its creditors just as states can under the U.S. Bankruptcy code. Congress should approve Resident Commissioner Pedro Pierluisi's legislation that would allow for this to happen.

Second, as I've stated before, the Department of Health and Human Services must end the inequitable treatment of Puerto Rico under Medicare, Medicaid and the Affordable Care Act. High costs and low reimbursement rates are a huge burden to Puerto Rico's budget and millions of U.S. citizens are at risk of losing care.

These are two steps we can take today, but I urge the Administration and Congress to work with Puerto Rico on a path forward that both provides immediate relief, and builds a foundation for sustainable, long-term economic stability.

Republican Jeb Bush, a longtime advocate for Puerto Rican statehood, has spoken out for some time about the need to provide the commonwealth with greater flexibility. Give Bush credit for that, especially as it is likely to put him at odds with many in his own party.

What distinguishes O'Malley's early and steady focus on Puerto Rico—and more broadly on the Caribbean—has been the precision he has brought to it as a former mayor and governor. That's earned him significant attention from Puerto Rican media and media in the United States that bothered to pay attention to the crisis.

"As a nation we must help our fellow U.S. citizens not only because it's the right thing to do, but because our region's economic stability depends on it." — Martin O'Malley

Now, the crisis is back in the news.

After lawyers for Puerto Rico failed on Tuesday to get the US Court of Appeals in Boston to reinstate a local law to help the commonwealth restructure a crushing $72 billion debt burden, other candidates picked up on the call, and they deserve credit for this.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said, "The people of Puerto Rico are hurting right now under a weak economy that has been struggling for years."

Clinton, who had expressed concern about Puerto Rico's circumstance earlier, provided more details, saying, "As a first step, Congress should provide Puerto Rico the same authority that states already have to enable severely distressed government entities, including municipalities and public corporations, to restructure their debts under Chapter 9 of the Bankruptcy Code."

Later in the day, Senator Bernie Sanders said, "I strongly believe Puerto Rico should be afforded the same bankruptcy protections that exist for municipalities across the United States. We need to do everything we can to allow Puerto Rico to restructure its debt in a rational way that does not harm its people, ordinary investors or pension funds in the United States. Chapter 9 protections would be a good first step."

Sanders added that "we also should recognize that the reason Puerto Rico has such unsustainable debt has everything to do with the policies of austerity and the greed of large financial institutions. Puerto Rico has been in a severe recession for almost a decade. Today, more than 45 percent of the people in Puerto Rico are living in poverty, the childhood poverty rate is greater than 56 percent and real unemployment is much too high. Our goal must be not only to give Puerto Rico the flexibility it needs to restructure its debt, but to make sure that it can rebuild its economy, create good-paying jobs and expand its tax base."

The right things are being said now. The volume is being amplified.

When the call for a reasonable response was faint, however, O'Malley was the one who stepped up. And he framed a message that was humane and responsible.

This is worth noting, because Puerto Rico's challenge is both fiscal and political. Political players in Washington have to be pushed to pay more attention to the island that is part of the United States but not a state. As a commonwealth, Puerto Rico has a unique relationship with the United States that creates both benefits and challenges. This has been especially evident as Puerto Rican officials have looked for options to restructure a debt-repayment burden so overwhelming that it threatens to empty the commonwealth's treasury, to cause profound hardship for island residents, and to leave officials with few options for renewing a battered economy.

While states and mainland cities have the varying degrees of flexibility to restructure debt burdens of the sort that Puerto Rico is facing, the island lacks them. At virtually every turn, Puerto Rican officials are prevented from taking steps that have the potential to stabilize its fiscal affairs while maintaining basic services—the only rational and humane response to the crisis caused by its inability to cover payments to bondholders who delighted in speculating on financial instruments issued by the commonwealth because the bonds had "triple-tax-free" status that exempted them from federal, state, and local income taxes.

There will be much resistance in Washington to doing right by Puerto Rico. It is going to take consistent leadership to get the attention and the action that is necessary to get an equitable restructuring of debts. This political pressure is going to require both economic common sense and a sense of morality that recognizes that helping our fellow citizens is "the right thing to do."

O'Malley has been out front on this one, applying the pressure. He deserves credit for that, and encouragement to keep it up.

Martin O'Malley: A Strong Foreign Policy Starts With a Global Middle Class // TIME // Martin O'Malley – July 7, 2015

I believe America's role in the world is to advance the cause of a global middle class.

After more than 12 years on the battlefields of Iraq and Afghanistan, and after a global financial crisis that decimated our middle class, it is understandable that many Americans would like to disengage from the world. But our country's security and prosperity demand that we be more engaged in the world, not less.

The first and foremost responsibility of the next Commander in Chief will be to keep America safe from 21st-century threats: violent extremism; nuclear proliferation; pandemics; cyberattacks; rising inequality; failed states; the mega-droughts, famines and floods caused by climate change; and more refugees than at any time since World War II.

We may have the most sophisticated military in history, but we do not have a silver bullet for these problems. So we must pursue a more collaborative, proactive, and farsighted foreign policy. We need new international partnerships to confront climate change and regional challenges, from the South China Sea to the sea lanes of the Middle East. We must create a new National Security Act to develop a broader framework for our national-security strategy. We must continue to adapt our military's force structure and spending to meet today's threats. And we must establish a cybersecurity unit in every state's National Guard to better protect Americans' personal data and critical infrastructure.

My vision for U.S. foreign policy focuses on the rise of a global middle class, which is a moral, economic, and national-security imperative. Eliminating the scourge of extreme poverty is a reflection of our most deeply held values. Supporting economic development will help us build the next generation of American political and economic partnerships. And protecting the dignity of human lives in fragile states will reduce the threat of being drawn into costly future conflicts.

We must also understand that comprehensive immigration reform is an economic and national-security interest. And we must forge a New Alliance for Progress based on shared interests in our own hemisphere, which we have neglected for too long. An early task should be to address the root causes of violence and instability in places like El Salvador and Honduras, heading off growing crises before they reach our borders.

We must listen to U.S. military leaders who have long recognized that climate change is a national security threat. Tackling the climate challenge will provide our nation the greatest business opportunity in 100 years. I strongly support an American Green Jobs Agenda. If we can put a man on the moon in a decade, we can power America with 100% renewable energy by 2050. It's not the technology that's lacking. It's the political will.

All of this is within our reach. But it will require new leadership. Twitter and Facebook are no substitute for personal relationships and human intelligence. We must recruit a new generation of Americans to exercise our global economic, diplomatic, military, and healing power in ways consistent with our values. And we must give them the tools to engage a new generation of leaders abroad, often in hostile environments where we lack historic ties.

The cornerstone of American strength in the world is economic strength at home. Maintaining our security in the long run will require an economy that works for all Americans. No fighter jet or troop battalion will protect us as much as a vibrant economy. A stronger middle class is the first garrison against any threat we might face.

The greatest power we possess as Americans is not military might, but the power of our own example. We must lead the world by strengthening the American middle class and supporting the rise of a global middle class — free from want, and free from fear.

That will make us more prosperous and secure. That will give our children a better future with more opportunity. And that will make our planet healthier, more peaceful, and more just.

O'Malley Denounces Super PACs As One Supporting Him Goes After Sanders // NHPR // Rachael Brindley – July 7, 2015

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley says he'd prefer there were no super PACs, but stopped short of calling on one supporting him to stop airing negative attack ads against Democratic rival Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders.

"I would hope that we would keep this debate a debate about the issues and I would prefer, not that I'm able to tell a super PAC what to do, I would prefer that we didn't have any super PACs, frankly," he said.

In an interview with NHPR's Morning Edition, O'Malley was responding to attack ads being aired by the Generation Forward PAC, which has been critical of Sanders for not being progressive enough when it comes to gun control.

O'Malley didn't say whether he supported or denounced the ads, only that he disagreed with the Citizens United decision, saying that once you're a candidate, "you're in a bit of a straight jacket. There are all sorts of rules and limitations, but super PACs have none."

O'Malley is scheduled to return to New Hampshire this week, as polls show he's got a lot of ground to make up to catch Sanders and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. A recent poll showed O'Malley with just 2 percent of support among Democratic voters.

O'Malley has acknowledged Sanders' recent surge in the polls, but attributes that to him being a "protest candidate." When asked what he meant by that, O'Malley said," History has shown usually the candidates that are surging in the summer are not the candidates who are surging in the primary."

"I'm running for President of the United States, and I have 15 years of executive experience, getting things done," he said. "I have to offer progressive values as well as an ability to actually deliver on the goals set, whether it's affordable college, reducing violent crime, increasing job creation, or defending the highest median income in the country through a recession."

SANDERS

Can Bernie Sanders Beat Hillary Clinton? Reporter's Notebook // NYT // Pat Leary – July 7, 2015

Deep down, does Bernie Sanders actually believe he can beat Hillary Rodham Clinton for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination?

After watching and interviewing him over the last several weeks, it's clear that the Vermont senator thinks he could win, yet also knows that it will take the political equivalent of lightning in a bottle.

"It's one thing for people to say that the country is going in the wrong direction, that we need to change directions," Mr. Sanders told me recently. "But is there the energy to get seriously involved in the campaign? Can the thousands of people coming to our events be turned into a real political organization? Will the people showing up this summer also show up to vote for our message next winter in the primaries?"

People may be surprised to learn that Mr. Sanders isn't some starry-eyed political fantasist, despite his socialist leanings and visions of moving America closer to a welfare-state system like those of Denmark and Sweden, which he praises as models of fair-minded government on the campaign trail.

After more than 30 years as an elected official, he is shrewd enough to know that the huge crowds he is drawing (including 7,000 people in Portland, Me., on Monday night) won't mean much if they don't support his candidacy in the way that matters, by rallying support from friends and acquaintances, and, of course, voting for him when the time comes.

One of the problems for Mr. Sanders is that his political organization is still relatively tiny (a few dozen paid staff members at this point, compared to hundreds for Mrs. Clinton) and can only grow so fast. And it is not growing as fast as the crowds showing up at his campaign events.

Why does that matter? Like another presidential candidate from Vermont, Howard Dean, in 2003, Mr. Sanders is using the summer before the primaries to build political momentum by holding events in reliably liberal enclaves where thousands of voters are flocking to his message, and the news media is spotlighting the big turnout.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Mr. Sanders doesn't have big teams of campaign staff on the ground in Portland, Madison, Wis., Minneapolis and elsewhere who can perform labor-intensive follow-up with virtually every voter who attended his rallies. That kind of outreach is a specialty of Mrs. Clinton's army of organizers and volunteers.

Give us time, say Sanders advisers, who are at this point focusing manpower and money on the two early-voting states, Iowa and New Hampshire.

"We have an incredibly great message, and a messenger that people are excited about," said Pete D'Alessandro, who is overseeing the Sanders campaign in Iowa. "But the key is the extent to which we can turn a grass-roots campaign into a winning campaign."

For Mr. Sanders to win the Iowa caucuses, which some Clinton allies and advisers now see as a real possibility, his organization and the savvy, experienced operatives running it will have to scale up substantially.

In the end, of course, there remains the threshold question: Do Americans hunger for radical change intensely enough, and in big enough numbers, to defeat a popular, well-financed Democrat who is widely considered more mainstream and electable than Mr. Sanders?

Why we shouldn't just call Bernie Sanders a 'liberal' // WaPo // Hunter Schwartz – July 7, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders is some progressives' great hope to defeat Hillary Clinton in 2016. But to say he's a down-the-line liberal would be to misread a political career the includes plenty of nuance.

Over the weekend, Sanders spoke on gun control and the tax-exempt status of churches, and if you were hearing him for the first time, you might think he was a Republican. He defended gun owners on CNN's "State of the Union," saying 99.9 percent of them obey the law and that gun manufacturers shouldn't be held responsible for murderers "any more than you would hold a hammer company responsible if somebody beats somebody over the head with a hammer."

On removing the tax-exempt status for churches that don't recognize same-sex marriage, he said he didn't know that he'd "go there" and that he respected "people who have different points of view."

Of course, neither of these positions necessarily run counter to the Democratic Party's principles -- Hillary Clinton isn't going after law-abiding gun owners, and Martin O'Malley isn't campaigning on taking away churches' tax-exempt status -- and Sanders's comments came in the context of his liberal bona fides, which he also mentioned. For example, he has voted to ban semiautomatic assault weapons and create instant background checks, and he voted against the Defense of Marriage Act, which was signed into law in 1996 by Democratic President Bill Clinton.

But there are certain things that might complicate Sanders for those on the left -- and it wasn't just this weekend, either. In 1993, as a member of the House, he voted against the Brady bill, which required federal background checks for most gun purchases. He also voted to allow people to transport guns on Amtrak, and he previously said he didn't think stricter gun control would end mass shootings. (Sanders's home state of Vermont, while generally quite liberal, is also very pro-gun rights.)

His history with immigration reform is similar, with a mixed record of supporting things like the Dream Act and the 2013 bill, but in 2007 helping to kill that comprehensive immigration reform deal by teaming with conservative Republican Sen. Charles Grassley (Iowa) on so-called "poison pill" amendments. Other Democrats opposed the final bill, as Sanders did, but almost all who did so came from the more moderate wing of the party.

Sanders might just become some GOP-leaning voters' favorite 2016 Democrat -- and not just because he's giving Hillary Clinton a tough time. It's not hard to see some of his positions appealing to more libertarian voters like former Ron Paul fans who prefer Sanders over Rand Paul. His arguments for a middle ground on some of our most controversial social issues also could appeal to voters frustrated by hyper-partisan politics.

He has surprised even himself with the turnout he's getting at some early campaign events. The more than 2,500 people who showed up to a Friday rally in Iowa were part of the largest crowd for any candidate in Iowa this cycle. But he's not just spending all his time in Iowa or New Hampshire. Sanders has had rallies in Colorado and Wisconsin, and he told The Nation that he believes candidates should have a 50-state campaign strategy, rattling off red states he thinks Democrats, as "the party of working people," should campaign in, including Mississippi, South Carolina and Alabama. On Monday, he drew 7,500 people closer to home in Portland, Maine.

Sanders is a socialist who championed progressive issues before they became more mainstream, but it's also clear that he's an independent and not a Democrat for a reason. He's beloved by liberal Democrats who feel Clinton is too moderate, but as his vision for a 50-state campaign and gun and tax-exempt comments show, he's making a play for people who might not describe themselves as "very liberal."

The issue on which Bernie Sanders aims for 'the middle' // MSNBC // Steve Benen – July 7, 2015

One of the biggest political stories of the summer is the reception Sen. Bernie Sanders is receiving on the presidential campaign trail. In a 2016 field filled with high-profile candidates, it's the Vermont Independent who's drawing the largest crowds.
This was evident yesterday in Maine, which came on the heels of similarly successful events in Iowa and Wisconsin last week. As Rachel noted on the show last night, Sanders is "having way more retail success on the campaign trail than anyone else in either party – anyone."
Sanders' early success seems baffling to much of the political world, but let this be a lesson to observers: there are plenty of unapologetic liberals out there who are eager to celebrate Sanders and his vision.
But just away from the spotlight, there's still just one potential trouble area for the Vermonter. A few readers flagged this Facebook item yesterday from the Coalition to Stop Gun Violence, which wasn't pleased with comments Sanders made in an interview on Sunday with CNN's Jake Tapper:

U.S. Senator Bernie Sanders' characterization here of the National Rifle Association-drafted "Protection of Lawful Commerce in Arms Act" that he voted for in 2005 is an utter fabrication. The bill has nothing to do with protecting upstanding gun manufacturers and dealers. Instead, it gives NEGLIGENT manufacturers and dealers blanket immunity from civil lawsuits. This law is THE REASON why two parents who lost their daughter in the Aurora shooting had their suit thrown out and are now being ordered to pay more than $200,000 in legal fees to gun companies that armed James Holmes.
It is an immoral law that denies victims and survivors their day in court – a fundamental democratic right – and Sanders' position is totally unacceptable. A big thanks to Jake Tapper for holding him accountable.

Sanders hasn't taken much heat from the left since launching his campaign, so it's worth pausing to appreciate what this is all about.
In the CNN interview, Tapper asked Sanders, "Earlier this year, the parents of one of the 12 innocent people killed during the Aurora movie theater shooting, they saw their lawsuit to hold ammunition sellers liable for the attack, they saw that dismissed. And one of the reasons was a law that you voted for which protects manufacturers of firearms and ammunition from being sued. Why did you vote that way?"
Sanders stressed that the NRA is not a fan of his – he's voted, for example, to close the gun-show loophole and in support of instant background checks – before explaining:
"Now, the issues that you're talking about is, if somebody has a gun and it falls into the hands of a murderer, and that murderer kills somebody with the gun, do you hold the gun manufacturer responsible? Not anymore than you would hold a hammer company responsible if somebody beat somebody over the head with a hammer. That is not what a lawsuit should be about.
"And this is part, by the way, I may say, of – you know, folks who do not like guns is fine, but we have millions of people who are gun owners in this country; 99.9 percent of those people obey the law. I want to see real serious debate and action on guns. But it is not going to take place if we simply have extreme positions on both sides. I think I can bring us to the middle."

It was this response that did not go over well with the Coalition to Stop Gun Violence. The litigation strategy against gun manufacturers is an important idea for many gun-safety advocates, and Sanders seemed to dismiss the idea as ridiculous.
Overall, I'm generally skeptical that gun policy represents a real threat to Sanders' support from the left. The senator's platform largely focuses on economics, not social issues, and my hunch is that if someone were to tell the thousands of voters showing up for Sanders' events that he's a moderate on guns, the vast majority wouldn't care.
But it's nevertheless a rare instance in which Sanders breaks with progressive orthodoxy, and it's an issue on which Hillary Clinton is squarely to the senator's left – a detail that Democratic voters may be hearing more about in the coming months.
* Update: In the statement from the Coalition to Stop Gun Violence, the group notes that two parents who lost their daughter in the Aurora shooting "are now being ordered to pay more than $200,000 in legal fees to gun companies."
A colleague reminds me, however, that this is not entirely correct – the parents have been ordered to pay "reasonable" damages, and the $200,000 figure is the one the company has requested. The judge, however, has not yet set the actual amount, and as of now, the parents in the case haven't been ordered to pay anything.

Bernie Sanders is no Ron Paul: What the press gets all wrong about the Vermont senator
He'll always be an underdog, but Sanders is a more viable candidate than even the left-wing media will acknowledge // Salon // Zaid Jilani – July 8, 2015

AlterNet Monday night, Bernie Sanders drew 7,500 people in the town of Portland, Maine, a locale that only has a population of 66,000. The Portland rally was the latest in a series of high turnouts, as Sanders is drawing more Americans to his events than any other candidate in either party.

In response to the high turnouts at Sanders's events, many in the media have sought to downplay his momentum by comparing him to former GOP presidential candidate Ron Paul, who also inspired an enthusiastic following:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The message these outlets are promoting is that Sanders, like Paul, will be able to get an enthusiastic base but will ultimately fail in his quest for the presidency and will only make only a minor impact on the debate. The implication seems to be that Sanders' views are on the fringe, like Ron Paul's. But are they? Or is it just that he is the only one articulating the need to address extreme inequality and expanding social security, which millions of Americans support?

The media message seems to rely on the idea that the two men are similar because they spark genuine enthusiasm among their supporters – which is perhaps a sad commentary on American politics that there are so few candidates who can do this that when they do they are instantly compared.

But the analogy doesn't really hold beyond that. In 2008, when Paul first ran for the presidency, he had 130,000 donors through the fourth quarter (January 2008). Recall that this was a campaign that began very early, with Paul entering the race on an official basis in March 2007 after forming his presidential exploration committee in January of that year.

Sanders, on the other hand, has already collected 250,000 donors after around two months of campaigning. This means that the Vermont Senator is collecting donors at nearly 8 times the rate that Paul did in his first run for the presidency.

The biggest difference between the two is the ceiling of support they were able to hit. Paul, despite his enthusiastic and genuinely creative volunteer and donor base, has advocated ideas like completely eliminating Medicare, Social Security, and Medicaid. Even among the GOP base, these ideas are extremely unpopular.

Sanders, on the other hand, has since his time as Burlington, Vermont's mayor, promoted ideas that are mainstream and popular. Even in the House of Representatives between 1994 and 2006, one of the most right-wing legislative bodies in American history, it was Sanders who passed the most amendments of any member of Congress.

There is no doubt that he's an underdog, but Sanders's ideas are popular and he is gaining traction at a far quicker rate than Ron Paul did. It's true that both Paul and Sanders were insurgent candidates who drew enthusiastic supporters. The similarities end there.

Bernie Sanders' Plan T o Make Solar Power More Accessible // Think Progress // Ari Phillips – July 7, 2015

On Tuesday, Vermont Senator and 2016 Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders introduced legislation aimed at making it easier for low-income families to take advantage of solar power. The bill, called the "Low Income Solar Act," came the same day that the Obama Administration announced a similar program aimed at installing 300 megawatts of renewable energy in federally subsidized housing by 2020.

The Sanders bill would aid in this effort by providing $200 million in Department of Energy loans and grants to help offset the upfront costs associated with installing solar panels on community facilities, public housing and low-income family homes, according to a press release. The projects would also have to prioritize loans for female- and minority-owned businesses, as well as target specific regions including Appalachia, Indian tribal lands, and Alaskan native communities.

"The scientific community tells us very clearly if we're going to reverse climate change and the great dangers it poses for the planet we must move aggressively to transform our energy system away from fossil fuels to sustainable energy," Sanders said in a statement. "We can achieve this goal, save families money and protect the planet for future generations."

According to the bill summary, homeowners with suitable roofs would receive grants to help them afford solar panel installation while renters or others without appropriate siting options would get connected through alternative means such as community solar gardens. Solar gardens are designed for those without rooftop access as a way to connect to a shared solar system that guarantees their electricity comes from solar power. Usually these community solar gardens are one or two megawatts in size and operated by third-party solar providers and local utilities.

Environmentalists are pleased that Sanders is running for president, as he is one of the climate change action leaders in the Senate.

Environmental activist and founder of 350.org Bill McKibben recently praised Sanders as "the ultimate what-you-see-is-what-you-get politician."

"Bernie's been in the forefront of all the crucial environmental fights of recent years, always willing to knuckle down and do the hard work of fighting the big corporations," McKibben told the Burlington Free Press.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As ThinkProgress previously reported, after the 2014 election that put the GOP in charge of the Senate, Sanders pushed the chamber to go on the record as to whether climate change is happening, caused by human activity, and resulting in "devastating problems in the United States and around the world."

In 2015 he attended the People's Climate March in New York City and told Democracy Now! that climate change is "a huge issue. It's a planetary crisis. We've got to act, and we have to act boldly."

He has also consistently opposed the Keystone XL pipeline and has talked publicly about the potentially disastrous environmental effects.

While Sanders entered the race an extreme long shot, his popularity has swelled in the early days of the campaign. On a recent visit to Iowa, one of the early caucus states, Sanders drew big crowds as well as the attention of Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton's campaign. Sanders is gaining major traction in Iowa polling, and has surpassed Clinton among very liberal voters.

Jimmy Carter: Bernie Sanders Is A 'Surprising' Democratic Competitor // HuffPo // Paige Lavender – July 7, 2015

Former President Jimmy Carter spoke with HuffPost Live about Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and his chances in the Democratic presidential primary, saying Sanders is a "surprising" contender.

While Carter said he thinks it's "almost inevitable" former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton will be the Democratic nominee, he thinks Sanders' success has probably been a shock to her campaign.

Carter said he thinks Sanders may be getting support from those who are seeking something different than a Bush or a Clinton in the White House.

"I would presume there's kind of an aversion to inheritance of the mantel of the presidency," Carter said.

HuffPost Pollster shows Clinton leading the Democratic presidential primary, with Sanders in a faraway second:

The Clinton Campaign Is Afraid of Bernie Sanders // The Atlantic // Peter Beinart – July 7, 2015

Obscured by the recent avalanche of momentous news is this intriguing development from the campaign trail: The Hillary Clinton campaign now considers Bernie Sanders threatening enough to attack. Fresh off news that Sanders is now virtually tied with Hillary in New Hampshire, Claire McCaskill went on Morning Joe on June 25 to declare that "the media is giving Bernie a pass … they're not giving the same scrutiny to Bernie that they're certainly giving to Hillary."

The irony here is thick. In 2006, McCaskill said on Meet the Press that while Bill Clinton was a great president, "I don't want my daughter near him." Upon hearing the news, according to John Heilemann and Mark Halperin's book Game Change, Hillary exclaimed, "Fuck her," and cancelled a fundraiser for the Missouri senator. McCaskill later apologized to Bill Clinton, and was wooed intensely by Hillary during the 2008 primaries. But she infuriated the Clintons again by endorsing Barack Obama. In their book HRC, Aimee Parnes and Jonathan Allen write that, "'Hate' is too weak a word to describe the feelings that Hillary's core loyalists still have for McCaskill."

McCaskill, in other words, is a great surrogate: someone eager enough to regain the Clintons' affection that she'll not only praise Hillary, but also slam their opponents. On Morning Joe, she had two talking points. First, journalists are giving Sanders a pass. Second, Sanders is a socialist, and thus can't win. Asked about Sanders' large crowds, McCaskill compared him to Ron Paul and Pat Buchanan, other candidates who sparked enthusiasm among their supporters but couldn't win a general election because of their "extreme message."

On point number one, McCaskill is undeniably correct: Media coverage of Sanders has been fawning, partly because many journalists harbor sympathy for his anti-corporate message but mostly because they're desperate for a contested primary. Given Sanders's strong poll numbers, the media would eventually have gotten around to tearing down the man they pumped up. But Team Clinton clearly wants to accelerate this process before Sanders gets any more momentum.

More intriguing is point number two. Sanders probably would be a problematic general-election candidate. But the liberals flocking to his side don't much care. Nor are the Clintonites likely to scare off many liberals by reminding them that Sanders is a socialist. Most of them already know. And far from hiding it, Sanders is quite effective when challenged on this point. Right after he jumped in the race, George Stephanopoulos gave Sanders exactly the treatment McCaskill is calling for now. First, he reminded Sanders he was a socialist. Then, when Sanders pointed to Scandinavia as his socialist model, Stephanopoulos snarked that, "I can hear the Republican attack ad right now: He wants America to be look more like Scandinavia." But Sanders was not cowed. "That's right. That's right," he replied. "And what's wrong with that? What's wrong when you have more income and wealth equality? What's wrong when they have a stronger middle class in many ways than we do?" It was the kind of performance more likely to leave liberals inspired than alienated.

McCaskill grew even less effective when Mark Halperin did something TV interviewers too rarely do: He demanded substance. Give “three specific positions” of Sanders that “are too far left,” he insisted. “I am not here to be critical of my colleague Senator Sanders,” McCaskill responded, absurdly. But Halperin caught her, noting that, “With all due respect, you already were: You said he was socialist and not electable.”

Then things got interesting. The specifics McCaskill offered were that Sanders “would like to see Medicare for all in this country, have everybody have a government-insurance policy,” that “he would like to see expansion of entitlement,” and that “he is someone who is frankly against trade.”

If Hillary actually goes after Sanders on these specifics, the Democratic race will get very interesting very fast. A debate about Obamacare versus single-payer health insurance, about expanding Social Security versus restraining its growth, and about the merits of free trade would be fascinating. But I doubt it’s a debate Hillary wants to have. She is, after all, running a campaign based on generating enthusiasm among the party’s liberal core. By taking bold, left-leaning positions on immigration, criminal justice, and campaign-finance reform, she’s trying (and so far succeeding) to erase her reputation from 2008 as a timid triangulator unwilling to offer big change. Yet the more Hillary emphasizes her opposition to single-payer health care, her opposition to expanding Social Security, and her support for free trade, the more she undermines her own strategy. By taking on Sanders on these issues, Hillary also implicitly takes on Elizabeth Warren, who has made expanding Social Security and opposing the Trans-Pacific Partnership two of her recent crusades.

The irony is that in 2008, when Hillary was trying to distinguish herself from her party’s left base in order to appeal to general-election moderates, an opponent like Bernie Sanders might have seemed like a blessing. In 2016, by contrast, when Hillary is running to the left, attacking him as too far left is dangerous.

No wonder McCaskill wants journalists to bury the curmudgeonly Vermonter. The Hillary campaign knows how tricky it will be to bury him themselves.

This Could Be Bernie Sanders' Biggest General Election Challenge // NBC News // Mark Murray – July 7, 2015

It's been the Summer of Bernie Sanders.

Thousands are turning out at his campaign events, his poll numbers are skyrocketing and the New York Times is now raising the question: What if Bernie Sanders wins Iowa?

But here's a different question: Can he win a general election?

While no national poll has yet to test Sanders in a trial heat against the Republican field, a June 2015 Gallup poll found that being a self-described socialist -- as Sanders is -- is more unpopular for a presidential candidate than being an evangelical Christian, Muslim or atheist.

According to the poll, 50 percent said they wouldn't vote for a socialist, compared with 40 percent who wouldn't vote for an atheist, 38 percent for a Muslim and 25 percent for an evangelical Christian.

"Bernie is too liberal to gather enough votes in this country to become president," Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., said last month on MSNBC's "Morning Joe."

When CNN asked Sanders about McCaskill's remarks, he responded that what voters truly care about are the issues. "I think people are coming out to our meetings because they want to hear some straight talk. They want to hear some truth about what's going on in America today."

There is one other factor to consider: Iowa Democratic caucus-goers have been much more pragmatic than their GOP counterparts have been in recent years.

While the last two Republican winners in Iowa (Mike Huckabee and Rick Santorum) ultimately didn't win the GOP presidential nomination, the last three Democratic winners of Iowa (Al Gore, John Kerry and Barack Obama) did win their party's nomination.

Rep. Barbara Lee: Bernie Sanders’ Message “Resonating,” “Galvanizing Progressives” // Buzzfeed // Andrew Kaczynski – July 7, 2015

California Rep. Barbara Lee, a key leader of progressive House Democrats, says she believes Bernie Sanders’ candidacy is “galvanizing progressives” and the progressive agenda.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I know Bernie first as a colleague and as a friend. I did serve with him on the then-Banking Committee and we actually came up with, initially, with the National Housing Trust Fund, worked together on that, and so I've worked with him on many, many issues and he's a friend," Lee said on the Jeff Santos Show.

"And I think what he is doing really is galvanizing progressives to really develop a strong progressive agenda that deals with all of the issues, that the majority of Americans want to deal with," she added. "And I think by the turnout and by what the response of the people around the country, we see that his message is resonating and so I think it's a good thing that he's out there," she said.

Last week Sanders supporters filled the 10,000 seat Veterans Memorial Coliseum in Madison, Wisconsin.

"I'm supporting the progressive agenda, Mayor DeBlasio, myself, and probably 8 to 10 members of Congress signed on to a progressive agenda that we are putting forward, that addresses many of the issues that Senator Clinton and Bernie Sanders are raising—excuse me Secretary of State Clinton and Senator Sanders are raising."

"And so income inequality, when you look at a living wage, when you look at climate change, there are many, many issues on that that progressive agenda that both Mrs. Clinton and Senator Bernie are really addressing and I think it's a very exciting time that he is doing this."

Bernie Sanders Hits a Triumphant Note As His Crowds Grow // TIME // Sam Frizell – July 7, 2015

Bernie Sanders, tan and slightly hoarse after six weeks of campaigning for president, began a stump speech on Monday night with a humble brag of epic proportions. "Sometimes, media people ask me, 'Well, Bernie, why are so many people coming out to your events?'" Sanders said to a crowd of 7,500 people in Portland, Maine.

"Well the answer is, I think, pretty obvious," Sanders continued, flashing a grin to cheers before getting stern again. "From Maine to California—we have friends in Alaska and Hawaii as well—the American people understand that establishment politics and establishment economics is not working for the middle class!"

The audiences are growing, he says, mostly because things in America are so bad. It's a note of encouragement in the midst of Sanders' famously jaundiced speeches, a nod to the tide of hope and discontent that his campaign is riding. "All over America, people are becoming involved in this campaign because they want change," Sanders said. "Real change! And that is what this campaign is about."

In a campaign by numbers, Sanders has taken a surprisingly strong grasp of the Democratic base. He drew crowds of thousands at several rallies in the last week, a notable feat 16 months before a general election. His poll numbers in the key early states of Iowa and New Hampshire show he is just a few paces behind Hillary Clinton, climbing within ten points of the presumptive Democratic nominee in one recent poll. And more than 250,000 people have donated to his campaign.

They are surprising metrics of success for a politician who for decades has seen himself as an outsider.

Sanders, who calls himself a democratic socialist, has done it armed with the promise of revolution. "The only way that change takes place is when we develop that strong grassroots movement, make that political revolution, stand together," Sanders said on Monday. "And then we bring about change."

Sanders had originally planned his Monday night rally in this seaside city of 66,000 people at a small venue on the water, but after thousands of RSVPs came back online, he was forced to reschedule the speech in a large arena usually reserved for big musical acts and hockey games. Nearly 8,000 people showed up, flooding the standing room with Mainers touting an eclectic mix of tribal tattoos, floral prints, polo shirts and New Balance sneakers.

Sanders' supporters found in Portland a candidate invigorated by the last months of success. With his left hand gripping the podium and his right hand dancing in the air as if holding a marionette, Sanders framed the recent liberal groundswell as part of a long legacy of activism. He pointed to the labor movement of the early 20th century, the women's suffrage activists and the civil rights movement as models for changing the country. He called for equal pay, paid family leave, a higher minimum wage, breaking up the big banks, and a massive infrastructure rebuilding program, a la the New Deal.

"There is nothing, nothing, nothing that we cannot accomplish!" said Sanders.

The crowds have taken note of Bernie's sanguine outlook and call to action.
"He's telling us that the people's movements—the grassroots movements—have succeeded when people got off their asses and they went out and marched," said James Murdoch, a self-employed designer and builder who attended the rally. "We're now getting to the point where people are getting involved and getting active again."

Portland was just one leg on Sanders' packed schedule: after a Madison, Wisconsin rally on Wednesday that drew some 9,500 people, Sanders spent three days in western Iowa corn country, where in Council Bluffs, 2,500 people attended a rally, according to the campaign—more than any other Iowa rally so far. (In Iowa he is trailing Clinton by 52-33.) He flew back to Burlington, and then drove with his wife and an aide the 250-odd miles to Portland.

Despite some of the change in tone, Sanders' speeches are still largely jeremiads on the perennial problems. Wall Street and the greed of the 1% are destroying America, Sanders says, climate change is wreaking drought and deadly heat waves, and misguided trade agreements are sending millions of jobs overseas to countries like China. There's only a short window of opportunity to stop global warming, and the middle class is in grave danger.

Among his fans, there's a new hint of faith that the gravity of the campaign may have jolted something awake. People in the audience said afterward that Sanders had struck a chord, particularly for those disappointed by the Obama years and cautious of the hope brand that dominated the 2008 campaign. "He's saying the things that need to be said," said Fran Falcone, a mental health counselor, of Sanders. "We need to start really looking at what's going in our country that's turned it into a place a lot of us don't recognize."

After the speech, Sanders dined at a Spanish-inspired restaurant a few blocks away on Portland's Congress Street. Word got around town he was there, and a small crowd gathered to seem him before he went to bed and made for Washington D.C. the next day for Senate duties.

Meanwhile, two buddies drank beers on the upstairs terrace of an Irish pub one block from the rally arena. They discussed the reality-check-and-momentum phenomenon. "Campaigns have cycles," said Portland resident Doug Hall about Sanders, speaking over the house music. "This is the wake-the-f-up cycle."

Paul Drinan, who runs a non-profit and also lives in town, agreed. "At this point in the game that's the appeal: there's no fluff in the message. He's telling it like it is," said Drinan. "Bernie's riding the wave."

As Labor Grapples With Candidate Endorsements, Transit Union Head Applauds Bernie Sanders
// IB Times // Cole Stangler –July 7, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders, I-Vt., says he wants to fight the "billionaire class," the signature phrase of a presidential campaign that's thrived by pitting beleaguered American workers against the rich and powerful. And as the self-described socialist continues his steady rise in the polls against Democratic primary opponent and presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton, he's winning support from the American underdogs par excellence: trade unionists.

No major unions have made White House endorsements, and the national AFL-CIO has yet to formally back a candidate. Still, a couple of state labor federations have passed resolutions backing Sanders' bid (even though they were rebuked in an AFL-CIO memo for breaching the federation's endorsement process); thousands of rank-and-file union members have signed up with the grassroots Labor for Bernie network; and last week, the recently retired head of one of the nation's largest unions joined Bernie's campaign team as a volunteer.

In a recent interview with International Business Times -- before the AFL-CIO fired off its warning memo last week -- the head of the nation's largest transit union cheered Sanders' "willingness to get outside the bubble." The Amalgamated Transit Union's Larry Hanley did not endorse the senator, and the union, which represents some 200,000 people, hasn't decided whom to back yet. But the ATU's Hanley credited Sanders for raising the sorts of problems, beyond bread-and-butter labor ones, that he says hurt American workers: things like unnecessary military spending, environmental degradation and prohibitively costly college tuition. Hanley becomes the first president of a major union to weigh in publicly -- and candidly -- about the Democratic primary matchup.

"This model doesn't work," said the outspoken labor leader in a wide-ranging conversation about national politics and the 2016 campaign. "It's not working for our unions, it's not working for our members, it's not working for our people and we have to change the model. It's not enough for us to just put our logo up on some candidate who's gonna stand up for the status quo."

"We are at a critical point in our history because our economy is inevitably going to be crippled by this ridiculous war spending, and our environment is teetering on the brink of disaster every day, and these are issues that have been neglected or made worse by the policies of the neocons, which obviously, includes people on both sides of the political aisle."

In particular, Hanley praised Sanders' support for free education at four-year public universities -- a plan that Clinton has not endorsed.

"Everybody running for president should just check that box; it shouldn't be a hard one, but I'm waiting to see if they will," he said. "Certainly anybody who's running in the party that claims to represent average working people ought to be saying, 'Yeah, you know what? There's no reason why we have to burden our kids with debt, why we have to make them come out of college with something comparable to a mortgage to pay before they get a job.' I mean, come on, this stuff is obvious."

"We live in a bubble of false discussion, and both sides, Democrats and Republicans, refuse to break out of that bubble," Hanley continued. "I think Bernie has shown more of a willingness to get outside the bubble, outside the box and have those discussions. As a consequence of that, I think he's a very good addition to the race. I think hopefully that he will encourage people in the Democratic Party to remember where they came from and remember their roots."

At the same time, Hanley offered some praise for Clinton. A former bus driver from the New York City borough of Staten Island, Hanley rose through the ranks of the transit union before his election to the top office in 2010. As he was serving as president of his New York City local, in 2000, he supported the then-first lady's successful Senate campaign. "I have a long history of fond affection for Hillary Clinton -- she has stood up and done many things in her lifetime of a historic nature," he said. Nevertheless, Hanley added -- with a flair of ambiguity -- "the truth as I know it is much more frequently expressed by Bernie, and even more than Bernie, by Elizabeth Warren."

But unions are in a pickle: Is it worth getting behind the underdog or does it make more sense to accept conventional wisdom and plan accordingly? After all, "if the election's between Hillary and just about any one of the Republicans that have come forward," Hanley said, "it's gonna look like heaven and hell."

"I'm going to confess to being conflicted, and I think as a matter of fact, the whole labor movement is conflicted over this," Hanley said. "While we see Bernie being a champion for many of our issues, we're anguished waiting on Hillary to take the lead on that, too."

In the ATU at least, Hanley said, leaders are expressing more frustration with the general political climate than during the last open Democratic presidential primary. (Exasperation, in general, jibes more with Sanders' calls for "political revolution" than Clinton's mild-mannered liberalism.) In 2007, a few years before Hanley took over the reins, the union endorsed Hillary Clinton for president, eventually spending more than $70,000 on her failed primary campaign.

"People are united in the notion that we can't accept the status quo, that the Democratic Party no longer is the party of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, it's more like the party of Nelson Rockefeller and the Republicans are more like the party of the Ku Klux Klan. That's kinda the way America's shifted," he said. "There is a boil going on right under the surface in America and the advantage Bernie has, by being willing to talk about this kind of stuff, is that he may just make that pot boil over."

Coons: "Not Confident" In Bernie Sanders' Qualifications // Bloomberg // Kendall Breitman – July 7, 2015

Senator Chris Coons is "not confident" that his colleague Senator Bernie Sanders is presidential material.

"I am not confident that he's got all the qualifications that the American public will look for in its next commander-in-chief," Coons said Tuesday on Bloomberg Politics' "With All Due Respect," adding that the ultimate judgment will be left up to the electorate.

Coons comments came after the Democrat was pressed on previous remarks from Senator Claire McCaskill - a Clinton ally - who on June 25 told MSNBC that Sanders is a "socialist" who "is too liberal to gather enough votes in this country to become president."

"I, quite frankly, am hoping for someone with more seasoning."

Coons, who has a close relationship with his fellow Delaware politician and potential 2016 candidate Vice President Joe Biden, has yet to endorse any specific candidate so far. Although he said believes Sanders has a "terrific record" on advocating for issues involving veterans, middle class economics and social and economic justice, Coons made it plain that the independent from Vermont, who caucuses with Senate Democrats, is not a contender for his nod.

"I, quite frankly, am hoping for someone with more seasoning, more experience, who served both in the executive branch and the legislative branch," Coons said. "I do think that the sort of experience that I think we will see in the likely Democratic nominee - whether that ends up being Joe Biden or Hillary Clinton - would span both the congressional and executive branches and I think that's the sort of experience we should look for in our commander in chief."

Fox News' big Bernie Sanders lie: The right's laughably lame effort to link Donald Trump and Sanders // Salon // Sean Illing – July 7, 2015

The media cannot help comparing Donald Trump to Bernie Sanders. And the comparison is not altogether wrong. Both candidates appeal to their respective bases. Both are challenging their party's establishment choices. And both are drawing massive crowds while surging in national polls.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The left (understandably) cringes at such comparisons. Bernie Sanders, whatever you think of him, is a serious person with real ideas. He's been a public servant since 1981, when he was elected mayor of Burlington, Vermont. He's now the longest-serving independent in the history of Congress. And his bid for the presidency, while a long shot, is clearly earnest.

Donald Trump, on the other hand, is a clown – a pompous, spray-tanned clown. More important, he's not actually running for president. His candidacy is a piece of performance art, a self-promoting circus. No one paying attention believes he wants to be president – I suspect he wouldn't run at all if this were a real possibility. Trump is campaigning because he can, because it bolsters his brand, and because people are dumb enough to listen to him talk about things he doesn't understand. If anything, Trump's campaign, much like Sarah Palin's, is a reminder of just how broken and stupid our political system has become.

However wrong it feels, Democrats ought to embrace the juxtaposition of Trump and Sanders for at least two reasons. First, it's accurate. Both candidates are indeed authentic representations of their party's base. Trump is a near-perfect distillation of the modern American right: The bravado, the bigotry, the raging idiocy, the false confidence, and the lack of ideas – it's all there in one gloriously manicured body.

It's not simply that Trump has bad ideas; it's that he doesn't have any ideas at all. And he's quite explicit about this. His announcement speech was essentially a stream-of-consciousness rant, totally bereft of anything resembling a policy proposal. His entire platform consists of him telling you a) how rich and smart he is and b) how stupid and broke everyone else is. That's it. If Trump were laughed out of conservative town halls, that'd be one thing. But he's not. He's embraced. According to this recent CNN poll, Trump is second only to Jeb Bush among national conservatives. This means Trump's fevered ramblings are resonating with the Republican base, even if Trump himself doesn't actually believe anything he says.

Bernie Sanders may well represent the "extreme" left of the Democratic Party, but he has real ideas; arguments can be made against them, of course, but the point is that he offers something substantive against which to argue. Unlike Trump, he has an actual platform, spelling out what he wants to do and how he intends to do it. From infrastructural decay to climate change to tax reform to higher education, Sanders is proposing solutions. Conservatives may not like those solutions, but they at least have to be reckoned with. This is a fundamental distinction between Trump and Sanders, one the GOP would prefer to ignore. Which leads me to the second reason why liberals should embrace Trump-Sanders comparisons.

To the extent that Trump and Sanders reflect the views of the right and left wings of their parties, they vividly clarify just how different the two parties are. It says something significant about the Republican Party that there's space for someone like Trump or Sarah Palin or even Herman Cain in it. These people aren't credible candidates; they're product-pushing brands looking to capitalize on conservative credulity. I don't believe the same can be said of Democratic candidates, no matter how wrong-headed you find their policy ideas.

Republican operatives know all of this to be true, which is why they'll do everything they can to equate Sanders and Trump. But they'll spin a false narrative. They'll argue, as John Gibson on FoxNews.com does, that Democrats should be "embarrassed" by Sanders for the same reasons Republicans should be embarrassed by Trump. Nobody, especially Democrats, should fall for this.

There are crucial differences between Trump and Sanders, some of which are cited above. But the most important difference here is between the two parties. Trump's circus act isn't possible in the Democratic Party. There are no celebrity candidates on the left – and certainly none capable of polling at the level Trump does. Democrats have had their share of bad candidates over the years, but they're bad for different (and less offensive) reasons than GOP candidates. They're bad for reasons related to their ideas or campaign platform or something politically relevant.

Only in the Republican Party do unserious candidates emerge as contenders. Only in the Republican Party are half-baked celebrities allowed to hijack the process to promote their private careers. Only among conservative Republicans are hucksters like Trump embraced. Democrats can't point these truths out enough.

The Republican Party created the Frankenstein that is Donald Trump. They've cultivated the idiocy he represents in their ranks for years. If Trump appeals to their base – and he obviously does – that tells you everything you need to know about who they are and what they stand for.

It also tells you how little respect the GOP has for the political process. There ought to be no place for Trump at this level of politics – in either party. But there is, and it's telling that it's permitted only in one party.

How durable is the Democratic advantage among Latinos? // WaPo // Greg Sargent – July 7, 2015

Is the overwhelming advantage that Democrats appear to be building among Latinos durable? Or could it prove far more ephemeral than it appears?

Put another way, can Democrats count on the 2016 GOP presidential ticket re-running Mitt Romney's historically bad performance among Latino voters? Or could a Jeb Bush (or, less likely in my view, Marco Rubio) general election candidacy whittle away at the Dem edge among those voters and reverse gains that had seemed to be hardening? Folks with long memories will recall that George W. Bush successfully pulled that reversal off in 2000. Couldn't that happen again?

This is one of the big questions of 2016, and its answer could be key to the campaign's outcome. Right now, there are plenty of reasons for Democrats to be optimistic about it. But it's worth entertaining the alternate scenario.

The case for Dem optimism has been fortified by Donald Trump, who in recent days has been spraying inflammatory quotes about immigrants around like a garden sprinkler. It's true that a number of GOP candidates have condemned his remarks. But as Michael Gerson details, Republicans still appear locked in a debate over the fundamental underlying question of whether their route to the White House lies in pumping up the white vote in the Rust Belt (a strategy perhaps foreshadowed by Scott Walker's move to the right on immigration) or in broadening their appeal beyond their demographic comfort zone (a strategy that Jeb Bush has urged on the party).

An additional reason for Dem optimism: Some Republicans are reportedly skeptical that the party should bother focusing its energy on nominating a candidate who might appeal to Latinos, on the grounds that those voters agree with Democrats on many issues, so being pro-immigration reform (as Jeb is) won't be enough anyway.

But some Democrats think their party should devote more time to worrying about the possibility that someone like Bush could win over enough Latino voters to make a decisive difference.

Simon Rosenberg, the president of the NDN think tank, floats the possibility of a GOP ticket that includes Bush and Nevada governor Brian Sandoval as vice president. Sandoval won a third of the Latino vote in his 2010 race, despite striking a hard-ish line on immigration, from which he has since backed off. Sandoval is relatively young. A Bush-Sandoval ticket would be led by a man with a Mexican wife and Latino-American children, and backed up by a man of Mexican descent — representing a bet that the GOP can contest Florida and western states with large Latino populations by improving its cultural appeal among those voters. Remember, Republicans only need to marginally reduce their historically large 2012 deficit among Latinos to improve their chances in such states.

So Rosenberg thinks Dems should invest more now in using the Trump outbursts to do more damage to the GOP brand among Latinos, as a kind of insurance policy against outcomes such as a Bush-Sandoval ticket. Rosenberg emails me:

"While the Democratic advantage today is significant, what we don't know is what happens with an historically Hispanic and Spanish friendly GOP ticket of, let's say, Bush and Sandoval. One Bush already used a smart Hispanic strategy to get to the White House. Given that, Democrats should be anything but confident and complacent right now. They need to be doing more, now, to make it harder for any GOP ticket to dig out of the hole Trump and others have dug for the GOP."

To be sure, there are big differences between the current moment and the run-up to the 2000 election. Dems are far more united behind immigration reform today than in the late 1990s, reflecting a changing Democratic Party increasingly reliant on Latinos. Buzzfeed reports that the Hillary Clinton campaign is developing a very comprehensive and aggressive plan for national Latino outreach. She has already pledged to go farther than Obama did on his executive actions on deportations. And today she renewed her support for comprehensive reform and attacked the GOP as backward on the issue. All of these things are signs of Clinton's commitment to the party's new demographic realities.

Meanwhile, House Republicans have steadily moved rightward on immigration, passing on a historic chance to act on the Senate reform bill and voting repeatedly to roll back Obama's deportation actions. That has many Dems confident — to a point.

"The damage may be too great to the GOP brand," one senior aide to a prominent Latino House Democrat says. "It may take more than Bush-Sandoval to rehabilitate this huge mistake Republicans have been making. But we don't know that. Personality, charisma, language, and the individual candidates mean a lot."

So, yes, perhaps Republicans have moved so far to the right on immigration that the party can't conceivably re-run the 2000 Bush immigration strategy, or perhaps even reconstituting that strategy wouldn't be enough to reverse GOP losses among Latinos at this point. But Democrats can't count on those outcomes.

Here's what Clinton, O'Malley and Sanders told America's biggest teachers union // The Washington Examiner // Jason Russell – July 7, 2015

Democratic candidates for president didn't miss their chance to address over 7,000 members of the National Education Association, which will be a powerful player in the Democratic primary process. Hillary Clinton, Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders all sent video messages to the teachers, who were gathered at the NEA's Representative Assembly.

In her address, Clinton used a theme of teachers unlocking potential in students. She talked about how teachers had encouraged her and her mother at a young age. "Every semester, in schools across the country, you multiply my mother's story by millions," Clinton told the teachers. "When we invest in our children, we do invest in our country's future, and we need to do more of that." Clinton promised high quality preschool, a doubling of spending on the federal Head Start program, and making college affordable for every single person.

Sanders struck a more ideological tone. "We need some fundamental changes in our national priorities," Sanders said. "Instead of giving tax breaks to billionaires, maybe we invest in our children, maybe we invest in education." He promised to make progress on fixing No Child Left Behind, on universal pre-K and on free college tuition. He also called teachers the real heroes and heroines of the country.

O'Malley tried to strike an optimistic note. "I believe, like you, that America's best days can still be in front of us," O'Malley said. He didn't make any specific promises about what he would do as president, but O'Malley touted the pro-union reforms he implemented in Maryland while serving as governor. For example, spending more on public education and making college more affordable. "This is what we do as Americans, to do more in every generation, to give our children a future with more opportunity, rather than less."

NEA President Lily Eskelsen Garcia was glad the three candidates took the time to address the union's members. "Recommending a candidate for president of the United States is a civic responsibility that educators take very seriously," said Eskelsen Garcia. "Going through the process to pick the right candidate that represents our values and sets the right priorities is critically important." Eskelsen Garcia has met privately with Clinton, O'Malley and Sanders as part of the NEA's endorsement process for the 2016 presidential election.

The NEA is the nation's largest teachers union, with 3 million members.

Florida's Economic Leap Under Jeb Bush Helped By Housing Bubble, Economists Say // WSJ // Bob Davis – July 7, 2015

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush says he can deliver 4% annual economic growth as president – about twice as fast as the U.S. has been growing recently. Why is he so confident? During his 1999-2007 tenure as governor, Florida grew 4.4%, his campaign boasts.

Today it even unveiled a cute graphic illustrating the claim.

The trouble is, say some economists, Gov. Bush's Florida growth record was based in large part on a housing bubble – national in scope but particularly frothy in Florida — that exploded the year he left office in 2007. Wells Fargo economist Mark Vitner, who has studied the Florida economy since the 1980s, estimates that the housing bubble accounted for about one-fourth of Florida's growth during Mr. Bush's tenure.

Subtract that out and you are left with 3.3% annual growth, somewhat faster than the 3% at which the U.S. economy grew annually during that period. (To be sure, the U.S. growth record overall back then was also affected by the housing bubble, though not as severely as Florida was.)

Mr. Vitner said that Mr. Bush deserves credit as governor for trying to diversify the state's economy, particularly by luring biotech companies to the state. He also says the U.S. could grow faster and maybe even at the 4% level that Mr. Bush has set as his target. But his Florida growth record isn't proof of that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Four percent growth was helped along by the housing boom," he said.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Bush said that 18% of Florida's job growth during Gov. Bush's two terms was in the housing or construction fields. "His overall economic record is impressive," spokeswoman Kristy Campbell said in an emailed response. That record includes balancing the state's budget, cutting taxes and fast job growth, she said.

Moody's Analytics chief economist Mark Zandi, a housing expert, says Florida's economy in the early 2000s isn't a model for U.S. growth over the coming years.

"The growth in Florida wasn't sustainable," he said. "It was something temporary" due to the housing bubble.

Moreover, Florida isn't representative of the U.S., he said, because its population grows more rapidly than the U.S. as a whole, giving it an expanding pool of workers. That in itself can add to growth.

"Florida isn't a useful analogy because of its unique demographic situation," he said. "It's important for leaders to be aggressive [on the economy] and set a higher bar," Mr. Zandi said. "But 4% is a stretch."

In an article in the Wall Street Journal last month, Mr. Bush's top economic advisers, Columbia University Business School Dean Glenn Hubbard and former Federal Reserve Governor Kevin Warsh, argued that 4% growth was attainable with the right set of policies.

"Setting a goal of 4% growth invites meaningful policy contributions from those who would be our leaders," they wrote.

Did Jeb Bush cut taxes each year as Florida governor? // Politifact – July 7, 2015

On the campaign trail, a recurring theme among Republican candidates is how they have cut taxes and reduced the size of government. For former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, that message is a core part of his presentation.

On June 2 at Gov. Rick Scott's Economic Growth Summit in Orlando, Bush noted how he cut taxes for Floridians. Bush said the following:

"In Florida, for eight years we cut taxes every year, totaling $19 billion."

PolitiFact Florida looked into Bush's record to see if his claim was accurate and reporter Joshua Gillin says Bush gets a HALF TRUE rating. Gillin says there are tax cuts that Bush can take credit for and others where he cannot.

"We took the detailed analysis provided by his campaign and showed it to several economists," Gillin said. "They responded that the methodology that they used to get to the $19 billion figure was pretty clear. We do have to point out that the $19 billion is in 2007, and it has been adjusted up to cover the time he was in office. The $19 billion includes tax cuts, but that's not the only thing in there. Adjustments to fees are in there, as well, as well as appropriations and the way that things were appropriated."

Gillin said, though, that some things included in the analysis were items that Bush had no control over.

"There were two big items in Bush's list," Gillin said. "One was the intangibles tax. This is the amount that you pay on investments and stocks. The other was the federal estate tax. This one is the amount that your estate pays in taxes to the government when you die. In both of those cases, Bush didn't have any control over those, so our experts questioned whether or not he could take credit for those."

Because Bush provided the detailed analysis to back up his claim, it gave PolitiFact a good overview of his claim. However, the analysis showed that there were things included that were outside of Bush's control while he was Florida governor, earning this claim a HALF TRUE.

Jeb Bush's Aggressive July Fundraising Schedule // Bloomberg // Michael Bender – July 7, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush, who says he's never taken more than a week of vacation at a time, is going to be hitting a couple of resorts next week. But it's not about fun. It's about funds.

The two-day event for top donors at the Bush family compound in Kennebunkport, Maine, on Thursday and Friday, followed by a luncheon on Saturday at Martha's Vineyard, are part of the aggressive fundraising effort that's been a hallmark of the former Florida governor's campaign so far. He held 14 fundraisers in the first 18 days after kicking off his campaign. Another dozen are on tap for the rest of July, according to a schedule obtained by Bloomberg.

Next week, Bush heads west next week for four fundraisers in California:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

July 14: Los Angeles.
July 15: breakfast Pasadena, followed by lunch in Santa Barbara.
July 16: event in Silicon Valley.

Bush then returns to the East Coast to raise money in the backyard of rival Republican presidential candidate Chris Christie, New Jersey's governor. Bush will headline two fundraisers on July 23 in New Jersey (Middleton and Short Hills) and an evening event on July 25 in East Hampton, New York.

The final two finance events right now on Bush's July schedule: a July 26 reception in Philadelphia and a July 31 fundraiser in Fort Lauderdale, Florida.

The fundraising push for his presidential campaign comes after Bush spent the first six months tapping the family's donor network and his own in Florida to raise money for the Right to Rise super PAC. Bush's team was aiming to raise $100 million in the first three months of the year. Bush has sought to spread some cash around to fellow Republicans, and told donors that he'd raised record-breaking amounts of early money. Top Bush ally Mike Murphy told super PAC donors that fundraising totals were going to give opponents "heart attacks," according to a BuzzFeed report.

The group's fundraising total will be public for the first time on July 30.

Jeb Bush: No Leniency for Edward Snowden // CBS News // Rebecca Kaplan – July 7, 2015

If Jeb Bush becomes president, his administration will not be making any deals that allows Edward Snowden to avoid punishment for leaking classified information from the National Security Agency (NSA) in 2013.

Snowden broke the law, recklessly endangered nat'l security, & fled to China/Russia. He should be given no leniency https://t.co/9RHNGsHZnx

— Jeb Bush (@JebBush) July 7, 2015
Bush was responding to an interview with Yahoo News in which Eric Holder, the former Attorney General who retired earlier this year, suggested a deal was possible.

Holder told Yahoo that Snowden's actions "spurred a necessary debate" about the bulk collection of phone records and that the U.S. was "in a different place" as a result. As to whether that meant it was possible Snowden might return to the U.S. from Russia, where he was granted asylum after fleeing the U.S., Holder said, "I certainly think there could be a basis for a resolution that everybody could ultimately be satisfied with. I think the possibility exists."

So far that's not the position of new Attorney General Loretta Lynch. Her spokesman Melanie Newman told Yahoo that the Justice Department wasn't changing its position on Snowden.

"This is an ongoing case so I am not going to get into specific details but I can say our position regarding bringing Edward Snowden back to the United States to face charges has not changed," she said in an email.

Snowden faces three felony charges if he returns to the U.S. His asylum in Russia has been a source of tension in U.S.-Russia relations, with President Obama canceling a planned meeting with Russian President Vladimir Putin at the G20 Summit in 2013 after Russia agreed to harbor Snowden.

Jeb Bush plans first Sioux City campaign stop // Sioux City Journal // Bret Hayworth – July 7, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush will hold his first Sioux City event since officially joining the broad field of 2016 candidates.

A former Florida governor, Bush has set the event for 2:45 p.m. Monday in UPS Auditorium at Morningside College, 3627 Peters Ave.

The event is open to the public, but those who want to attend should obtain a ticket by visiting the Eventbrite web site.

Bush is a brother and son of two former presidents, George W. Bush and George H.W. Bush. Jeb Bush won two gubernatorial terms, in 1998 and 2002, serving eight years as Florida's chief executive.

Bush hired campaign staff in Iowa earlier this year but did not officially become a candidate until June 15. In his campaign launch announcement from Miami-Dade (Florida) College last month, Bush said he should win because of his own experience, not because his family ties.

"I will take nothing and no one for granted -- I will run with heart, and I will run to win," he said.

Bush campaigned in Iowa in June but did not visit Sioux City.

The Morningside auditorium venue has been used by other Republican presidential candidates this year, including U.S. Sen. Ted Cruz and Carly Fiorina. There are more than a dozen Republicans running for president, so most are polling with single-digit percentage totals.

In a July 1 Quinnipiac University Poll of likely Iowa Republican caucus participants, Bush placed sixth, with 8 percent support. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker continues to lead in recent Iowa polls, topping the Quinnipiac poll at 18 percent.

In a prior Quinnipiac poll in May, Bush had 5 percent.

Bush also will speak on Tuesday in Council Bluffs.

The Feb. 1 Iowa caucuses are the first event in the presidential nominee-selection process.

Jeb Bush: 'No leniency' toward Snowden // The Washington Examiner // Elizabeth Potter – July 7, 2015

Republican presidential nominee Jeb Bush says he's outraged at the idea of Edward Snowden receiving a plea deal and being allowed back into the United States.

Bush tweeted that Snowden "should be given no leniency" for his actions.

Snowden has been charged with three felonies under the Espionage Act for distributing tens of thousands of government documents to the press. Those leaks, however, made Snowden a hero to many because they revealed the vast surveillance program involving the collection of bulk phone data, which Congress scaled back just weeks ago.

Former Attorney General Eric Holder said on Monday that the U.S. may have benefitted from Snowden stealing approximately 1.7 million documents from the National Security Agency Net and the Joint Worldwide Intelligence Communication System.

"We are in a different place as a result of the Snowden disclosures," Holder said. "His actions spurred a necessary debate. I certainly think there could be a basis for a resolution that everybody could ultimately be satisfied with — I think the possibility exists."

However, some, such as former NSA and CIA director Michael Hayden, oppose the idea of a plea deal.

Snowden's act "was the greatest hemorrhaging of legitimate American secrets in the history of the republic, no question about it," Hayden said, according to the Free Beacon. "I'm quite stunned that we would be considering any return of Snowden to this country other than to meet a jury of his peers, period."

Snowden's attorney, Ben Wizner, said Holder's comments were the closest things to acknowledging that Snowden's actions may have had a positive impact on the U.S., Yahoo Politics reported.

"The former attorney general's recognition that Snowden's actions led to meaningful changes is welcome," said Wizner. "This is significant ... I don't think we've seen this kind of respect from anybody at a Cabinet level before."

RUBIO

Marco Rubio's Education Plans Echo Some Obama Ideas // NYT // Alan Rappeport – July 7, 2015

Senator Marco Rubio's economic speech in Chicago on Tuesday criticized the failed Democratic policies of the past and called for the need to unleash American innovation. But when it came to education policy, some of presidential candidate's proposals had a familiar ring to them.

Mr. Rubio, the Republican from Florida, called for overhauling the college accreditation system, creating a pay scale for student loan repayment and expanding investment in vocational training.

Many of the details from those ideas sounded strikingly similar to policies that President Obama has called for during his time in office.

Mr. Rubio called for creating "a new accreditation process that welcomes low-cost, innovative providers" that would allow new competitors into the education marketplace. In 2013, Mr. Obama proposed establishing "a new, alternative system of accreditation that would provide pathways for higher education models and colleges to receive federal student aid based on performance and results."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Tuesday, Mr. Rubio proposed a progressive scale for student loan repayments to ease burdens on people who take lower wage jobs when they graduate. "The more they make, the faster they pay back their loans; and the less they make, the less strain their loans cause," he said.

Last summer, Mr. Obama made a similar appeal, devising a "pay as you earn" plan that give Americans who were repaying loans the chance to cap those payments at 10 percent of their incomes.

The senator also said that if he is elected president he would expand apprenticeship programs and make vocational training more easily accessible. While the idea came without specifics of how this would be achieved, it did echo a proposal that Mr. Obama put forward at the end of his first term that to ramp up spending on vocational training at the high school and college level.

While Mr. Rubio has worked with Democrats on education legislation in the past, not all of his ideas are popular with the opposing party. Critics argue that his plan to create "student investment plans" could make college more expensive for some people, and the suggestion that he might eliminate the Department of Education is likely a non-starter with liberals.

Holly Shulman, a spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee, also noted that Mr. Rubio blocked a bill that would allow students to refinance their student loans, and opposed the president's plan to make community college debt-free to anyone who works.

"Marco Rubio has yet to articulate any new ideas," Ms. Shulman said.

Marco Rubio Attacks Higher Education 'Cartel' and Jabs Rivals // NYT // Jeremy Peters – July 7, 2015

Senator Marco Rubio, laying out an economic blueprint that will be central to his campaign for president, called Tuesday for dismantling the "cartel of existing colleges and universities" that he said left too many students without viable career paths and burdened by tens of thousands of dollars in debt.

In a speech that was part history lesson, part policy prescription, and punctuated with barbs at Hillary Rodham Clinton, Mr. Rubio spoke to a crowd of several dozen people at a technology center and put forward his vision for the American economy if it is to thrive into the next century. He also took veiled swipes at the Bush family.

Mr. Rubio, a Florida Republican, dismissed the idea of a minimum-wage increase as "thinking small." He said that big government had rigged taxes and regulations in favor of powerful interests. And he proposed an overhaul of higher education that would change the way colleges are accredited and student loans are repaid.

"We do not need timid tweaks to the old system; we need a holistic overhaul," Mr. Rubio said. "We need to change how we provide degrees, how those degrees are accessed, how much that access costs, how those costs are paid and even how those payments are determined."

As part of his higher education plan, Mr. Rubio has proposed two innovations that are aimed at making student loans more affordable. First, he said, he would put in effect an income-based payment system to allow graduates earning lower salaries to repay creditors on a timetable that he said would cause "less strain." Those who earn more would have to repay their loans at a faster rate.

A form of income-based repayment plans for student loans already exists.

Mr. Rubio would also allow students to partner with investors who would cover the students' tuition in exchange for a percentage of their earnings for a few years after graduation.

The speech mostly contained ideas that he had put forward before. But it was a return to the campaign trail after almost two full months in which he was on a coast-to-coast fund-raising tour.

He used his time in Chicago to take swipes at his opponents, some overt and others more subtle. He referred three times to Mrs. Clinton, who is running her second campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination. "The race for the future will never be won by going backward," he said. "It will never be won by hopping in Hillary Clinton's time machine to yesterday."

Other slights appeared aimed just as much at some of Mr. Rubio's Republican opponents, like former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida. Mr. Rubio said the ideas offered by Mrs. Clinton "and other outdated leaders are narrow and shortsighted."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We have learned, painfully, that the old ways no longer work," he said, "that Washington cannot pretend the world is the same as it was in the '80s, it cannot raise taxes like it did in the '90s, and it cannot grow government like it did in the 2000s."

Those last two references — to raising taxes in the 1990s and expanding government in the 2000s — were not coincidental. Mr. Bush's father, President George Bush, famously approved a tax increase in 1990 after promising to block any. And his older brother, President George W. Bush, oversaw a significant expansion of the federal government after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Five takeaways from Marco Rubio's speech on the innovation economy // WaPo // Steven Overly – July 7, 2015

Marco Rubio is pushing a series of changes to the nation's tax, immigration and education systems that the Republican presidential candidate contends will better prepare Americans for an economy driven by rapid technological innovation.

The ideas outlined by the Florida senator in a speech on Tuesday, which was delivered at a co-working space for tech start-ups in Chicago, come as other presidential candidates are also trying to court the tech community's vote. Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton have all met with technology executives and enthusiasts in Silicon Valley in recent months, hoping to mine the wealthy sector for potential donors and voices of support.

With that audience in mind, Rubio's speech focused largely on policy issues that are front of mind in tech circles, such as finding ways to get more highly skilled immigrants into the country and overhauling the tax code.

"Today's Technological Revolution carries extraordinary opportunities – even more, I believe, than the Industrial Revolution ever did. But we have not yet seized these opportunities, nor is it guaranteed that we will," Rubio said. "Whether we do or do not will depend on the actions we take, the leaders we choose, and the reforms we adopt."

What follows are five takeaways from the policy pitch Rubio delivered on Tuesday.

Immigration

Rubio did not outline a comprehensive plan to address existing undocumented immigrants, but said the system should prioritize those immigrants who possess the skills and education that many American employers desire.

"This requires reforming our legal immigration system to make it skill- and merit-based rather than family-based, which will protect American workers and attract more talent to grow our economy and create jobs," Rubio said.

That position should be well received among technology companies, which have long pushed for visas to be made more readily available to immigrants with science, technology, engineering and math degrees. Companies contend there aren't enough American workers who possess those skills, and existing laws make it expensive and difficult to recruit talent from overseas.

Education

Rubio also set his political sights on the U.S. higher education system, which he said is "controlled by what amounts to a cartel of existing colleges and universities, which use their power over the accreditation process to block innovative, low-cost competitors from entering the market."

He vowed to establish a new accreditation process within his first 100 days in office that would be more welcoming to new players. Rubio also reiterated support for the "Student Right to Know Before You Go Act," which would inform students how much money they can expect to earn from a given degree prior taking out student loans.

Student Loans

The cloud of debt that follows many students after college prevents many from pursuing a higher education, Rubio told the audience. That's especially true for low-income individuals and single parents, who most stand to benefit from a degree.

Rubio said he plans to implement income-based repayment of student loans, meaning those who earn more money are expected to repay their loans faster. He also called for the creation of Student Investment Plans that would allow wealthy individuals to invest in a young person's education in exchange for a cut of their future salary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Finally, he called for an expansion of vocational training and apprenticeship programs so that students who don't pursue a college education at least graduate from high school with certifications for technical jobs, such as as mechanics, electricians or welders.

Taxes

Rubio criticized the country's current tax system for being unfavorable to large corporations and small businesses alike, a factor that he said contributes to companies shifting their employees and headquarters overseas.

He pledged, if elected president, to make the corporate tax rate "competitive" with the 25 percent average found in other developed countries. He also proposed eliminating tax rules that allow the United States to levy taxes on money that companies earned overseas.

"We have a tax code that punishes American companies for competing in the global economy, and a regulatory system that prevents small businesses – the primary engines of innovation and job creation – from competing against established players," he said.

Hillary Clinton

Rubio's speech wasn't devoid of politics. Amid the policy proposals were several jabs at Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton, whom Rubio repeatedly referred to as a sort of political relic who is too entrenched in the old ways of Washington.

"The race for the future will never be won by going backward. It will never be won by hopping in Hillary Clinton's time machine to yesterday," Rubio said. "She seems to believe pumping more of today's money into yesterday's programs will bring prosperity tomorrow. It will not."

Marco Rubio Outlines Economic Initiatives // WSJ // Patrick O'Connor – July 7, 2015

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio cast himself Tuesday as "a new president for a new age," laying out a series of economic initiatives to boost growth and give lower- and middle-income Americans access to the training and education needed to gain a foothold in the 21st-century economy.

The Republican candidate outlined the proposals in an economic speech in which he urged policy makers to help workers overcome challenges presented by globalization, the technology revolution that spawned the Internet, and the automation displacing workers in all segments of the economy.

"The path to the middle class is narrower today than it has been for generations, and the American dream so many achieved in the last century is in peril," Mr. Rubio said, at a technology hub in Chicago's Merchandise Mart where entrepreneurs congregate to work on new ventures. "It is not the result of a cyclical economic downturn that will naturally correct itself. It is borne of a fundamental transformation."

Mr. Rubio and several of his GOP rivals have made the economy, particularly wage stagnation and the sense that working-class Americans are falling behind, a central theme of their campaigns. Mr. Rubio is using his background as the son of a bartender and hotel maid to align himself with people who haven't enjoyed the benefits of the economic recovery.

Some candidates and their advisers believe the eventual nominee will be the candidate who offers the best recipe to address these concerns.

Capital Journal is WSJ.com's home for politics, policy and national security news.

Most of the remedies Mr. Rubio proposed are staples of his economic-policy platform, including plans to reduce corporate tax rates to 25%, curb federal regulations by putting a cap on how much they cost, and allow companies to bring overseas revenue back to the U.S. without an additional tax hit. He also would cut taxes on business investments and give the public more access to the digital spectrum controlled by the federal government.

Mr. Rubio, who authored a tax plan with Sen. Mike Lee (R., Utah), would leave the top individual tax rate at 35%, unlike some of his GOP rivals. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie's top tax rate would be 28%. Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul has called for scrapping the current tax code and replacing it with a 14.5% flat tax on all income, regardless of how much money a person makes.

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, meanwhile, has pledged to abolish the Internal Revenue Service entirely.

Many candidates haven't yet offered detailed plans, including former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, the clear favorite for the Democratic nomination.

A number of prominent conservatives have criticized Mr. Rubio's tax proposals, saying they would add to the deficit unless they were paired with other policy changes to cut federal spending. Others disagree with his calls to expand the child-tax credit, expressing doubt about whether his $2,500 credit would spur economic growth.

One cornerstone of the speech—and Mr. Rubio's campaign—was his vow to revamp the higher-education system by expanding access to trade schools and for-profit colleges and making it easier for students to secure federally protected loans.

On Tuesday, he promised to "bust" the higher-education "cartel" dominated by "existing colleges and universities."

The Florida senator also wants to let companies pay for employees' education, invest more in vocational training starting in high school, and require schools to tell prospective students how much they can expect to earn after graduation, depending on the degrees they pursue.

Mr. Rubio took shots at Mrs. Clinton and made veiled swipes at Mr. Bush's father and brother. The government shouldn't raise taxes as it did under Presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton, he said, or "grow government" like it did under Jeb Bush's brother, President George W. Bush.

"The race for the future will never be won by going backward," Mr. Rubio said.

On Tuesday, Jeb Bush's campaign unveiled a new video calling him an executive who made "tough decisions" that spurred job growth and balanced the state's budget—a not-too-subtle contrast with Mr. Rubio and other current and former senators in the race.

Rubio rips GOP, Clinton // AP // Steve Peoples – July 8, 2015

The country's future can't thrive "by hopping in Hillary Clinton's time machine to yesterday," Sen. Marco Rubio said Tuesday in Chicago.

CHICAGO -- Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida, a Republican presidential candidate, called for lower corporate tax rates, looser Internet regulation and broader college accreditation in an economic policy speech Tuesday.

Rubio jabbed at fellow Republicans, primarily for letting government grow so much in the 2000s, and Democrats, for policies that he said stifle job growth and "snuff out innovation" -- namely, their push for a higher minimum wage and for tax increases on the wealthy.

"We need in this country a new president for a new age," the Florida senator said from the downtown Chicago offices of a digital startup. The nation would be better served, Rubio said, by embracing the "technological revolution."

The forward-looking theme of Rubio's address mirrors his campaign, which aims to distinguish him from leading competitors in both parties -- including Republican Jeb Bush and Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton, whose families have been mainstays in American politics for decades.

He repeatedly criticized Clinton, the former secretary of state who is seeking the Democratic nomination.

"The race for the future will never be won by going backward," Rubio said. "It will never be won by hopping in Hillary Clinton's time machine to yesterday."

And while not naming Bush, a former Florida governor, Rubio lashed out at the policies enacted when Bush's father and brother served in the White House.

"We have learned, painfully, that the old ways no longer work -- that Washington cannot pretend the world is the same as it was in the 1980s, it cannot raise taxes like it did in the '90s, and it cannot grow government like it did in the 2000s," he said.

While his campaign billed the Chicago speech as a major address, most of the "innovation agenda" he outlined represents policies he has proposed previously.

Rubio called for changes to the tax code that would lower the corporate tax rate, establish a "territorial tax system" and allow "immediate, 100 percent expensing," which would permit businesses to take deductions on capital investments all at once.

He previously released a detailed tax plan that would reduce all corporate taxes to 25 percent and cut taxes on business investment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio also promoted a plan to modernize the national laboratory system in line with a proposal he introduced with Sen. Chris Coons, D-Del., earlier in the year. And he reiterated his opposition to so-called Net neutrality, which aims to prevent Internet service providers from setting different download speeds for different types of content.

And as he often does, Rubio said an immigration overhaul is necessary "to protect American workers and attract more talent to grow our economy and create jobs."

On higher education, Rubio vowed to "bust the cartel" of existing colleges and universities by creating a new accreditation process. His campaign said Rubio would allow lower-cost alternative education providers, such as online academies, to earn accreditation.

Democratic National Committee spokesman Holly Shulman said Rubio "continues to peddle the same failed Republican policies that cripple the economy and squeeze the middle class."

Rubio, 44, is among more than a dozen candidates seeking the 2016 Republican presidential nomination. He is also one of the youngest candidates in the race.

He appeared in Chicago hours before he was to begin his first extended campaign swing through an early voting state. He was scheduled to campaign in Iowa, the first-in-the-nation caucus state, through Thursday.

Marco Rubio Economy: 'The old ways no longer work' // AP // Steve Peoples – July 7, 2015

With an eye on the future, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio is laying out his plans for an "innovative economy" and "revolutionized higher education system" in his first major domestic policy speech as a presidential candidate.

The Republican White House hopeful will outline his policies at a Tuesday morning speech in Chicago before an extended campaign swing through Iowa.

"We need a new president for a new age — one with original ideas to unlock the two great doors to the future: the doors of innovation and education," Rubio says in prepared remarks. "I come before you today to discuss my ideas to spur American innovation onward, to ensure the rise of the machines will not be the fall of the worker, and to create a new American Century."

The forward-looking theme of Rubio's address mirrors that of his entire campaign, which helps distinguish himself from leading competitors in both parties whose families have been mainstays in American politics for decades. The 44-year-old Rubio does not name Republican former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush or Democrat Hillary Clinton in excerpts of his remarks released to The Associated Press, yet he cites the years that the Bushes and Clintons governed.

"We have learned, painfully, that the old ways no longer work — that Washington cannot pretend the world is the same as it was in the '80s, it cannot raise taxes like it did in the '90s, and it cannot grow government like it did in the 2000s," Rubio says.

While he has yet to release specifics, an aide said Rubio would detail an "innovation agenda" focused on tax reform that includes a lower corporate tax rate, the establishment of a "territorial tax system" and allowing "immediate 100 percent expensing for businesses," which allows businesses to take deductions for capital investments all at once.

He will also promote a plan to modernize the national lab system.

The aide spoke on the condition of anonymity so as not to publicly pre-empt Rubio's address.

Rubio will also address his opposition to so-called "net neutrality," which would prevent Internet service providers from setting different download speeds for different types of content.

On higher education, the aide said Rubio would call for an overhaul of the accreditation process, among other reforms.

"Today's Technological Revolution carries extraordinary opportunities - even more, I believe, than the Industrial Revolution ever did," Rubio says. "The race for the future will never be won by going backward."

Marco Rubio slams Hillary Clinton, higher ed 'cartel' in policy speech // Politico // Eli Stokols – July 7, 2015

Picking up on the generational themes of his announcement speech three months ago, Marco Rubio laid out an economic plan Tuesday that sought to distinguish himself as "a new president for a new age."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Promising to usher in a “new American century” — his campaign’s forward-looking slogan — Rubio painted a picture of himself as a candidate in step with a new era and a fast-changing economy, promising to reform the Tax Code and modernize higher education to better align with how the 21st-century economy now works.

The much-publicized policy speech, before an audience of more than 200 local entrepreneurs, included direct attacks on Hillary Clinton as an “outdated” representative and implicitly dismissed one of his main GOP rivals, Jeb Bush, as a candidate of the past.

“New opportunities cannot be seized by old ideas, and the future must be embraced with enthusiasm and vision,” Rubio said.

By framing himself as the more youthful, future-oriented candidate against the 60-somethings, the first-term Florida senator sought to define Clinton and Bush as his main rivals while laying out his case against them — that, at 44 years old, he’s the one armed with new ideas and a deeper understanding of the challenges of modern college students and young entrepreneurs.

“For the first 15 ½ years of this century, Washington has looked to the past,” Rubio said. “Our economy has changed, but our economic policies have not. And we have learned, painfully, that the old ways no longer work.”

Balancing a gloomy characterization of an uncertain future with his own optimistic promise to help lay “the cornerstone for a new American century,” Rubio packaged a modest mix of policy proposals in lofty, sometimes forceful rhetoric.

But the ideas outlined in the speech weren’t new for Rubio, who has already laid out some of the proposals outlined Tuesday, including a proposal to dramatically lower the U.S. tax on companies’ foreign earnings.

Rubio used the speech as an opportunity to criticize Clinton’s economic policies, offering to bust regulations that “are the result of an alliance between Big Business and Big Government” in order to jump-start the economy.

“Hillary Clinton argues the economy is rigged in favor of wealthy interests — but what she won’t tell you is that Big Government is doing the rigging,” Rubio said. “A massive regulatory apparatus inevitably becomes the instrument of those with the lawyers and lobbyists necessary to influence it.”

At almost every point in his speech, Rubio sought to contrast his vision against Clinton, the likely Democratic nominee.

“The race for the future will never be won by going backward,” he said. “It will never be won by hopping in Hillary Clinton’s time machine to yesterday. She seems to believe pumping more of today’s money into yesterday’s programs will bring prosperity tomorrow. It will not. Nor will thinking small. Hiking the minimum wage by a few dollars will not save the American Dream; it will accelerate automation and outsourcing. Increasing taxes and regulations will not promote fairness or opportunity; it will snuff out innovation and crush small business.”

When he turned to higher education, Rubio again slammed Clinton and her ideas as “outdated” and “shortsighted,” and he called for breaking up the higher ed “cartel” — he promised a “holistic overhaul” of how colleges and universities control tuition and financial aid, offer instruction and provide degrees.

“Our higher education system is controlled by what amounts to a cartel of existing colleges and universities, which use their power over the accreditation process to block innovative, low-cost competitors from entering the market,” Rubio said.

“Within my first 100 days, I will bust this cartel by establishing a new accreditation process that welcomes low-cost, innovative providers. This would expose higher education to the market forces of choice and competition, which would prompt a revolution driven by the needs of students — just as the needs of consumers drive the progress of every other industry in our economy.”

Rubio, however, has come under fire for supporting a segment of the higher education system that some see as predatory — for-profit colleges. Last year, Rubio asked the Department of Education to show leniency to Corinthian Colleges, a for-profit college company that was forced to close down its campuses after the Obama administration accused it of lying about job placement rates.

In a question and answer session following the speech, which took place at 1871, a digital startup incubator inside the city’s old Merchandise Mart, Rubio explained that the old measures of economic stability such as the unemployment rate are no longer as indicative of the true state of the workforce because so many people are underemployed and others who have jobs continue to struggle with the skyrocketing cost of child care.

He also lamented that so many young people have graduated from college with student loan debt only to find that their degrees are misaligned with the kinds of jobs a rapidly changing economy is creating.

"All the things we once told people they needed to do to succeed no longer work," Rubio said. "No one has explained why the old ways no longer work and what the new ways should be."

Marco Rubio is about to give a major economic speech that he hopes will kick-start his campaign // Reuters // James Oliphant – July 7, 2015

Presidential candidate Marco Rubio will deliver an economic speech in Chicago on Tuesday with the goal of separating himself from the packed field of Republican candidates and kick-starting his campaign into a more active, visible phase.

Rubio, a senator from Florida, has spent much of the last several weeks either bogged down in a U.S. Senate preoccupied with a Pacific Rim trade deal or out of the public eye raising money.

But after his Chicago speech, Rubio will visit Iowa and then Nevada, both of which hold key nominating contests early next year. His campaign says to expect further travel, likely to New Hampshire.

With his Cuban-American background, youth and compelling biography, Rubio, 44, has long been viewed by campaign analysts as one candidate in the ever-growing field of 14 who could break out from the pack.

As yet, however, there is little sign of that. State polls in early primary states, save for his home state of Florida, have typically shown Rubio struggling to crack double-digits. A Reuters Ipsos poll showed Rubio drawing support from 9.6 percent of likely Republican primary voters nationally - behind former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, the nominal front-runner, and reality show star Donald Trump.

Rubio is expected to use his speech in Chicago to defend his tax-reform plan, which has been criticized in conservative circles, and touch upon themes that some economists say sound unusual coming from a Republican presidential hopeful.

Rubio has used previous campaign events to discuss the plight of working mothers, middle-class families and college students, wading into topics that Democrats often emphasize. He has questioned whether a traditional college education provides a good bargain for some students who he says would benefit more from skills-based training.

"Only through an innovative economy can we translate new technologies into new middle-class jobs," Rubio will say Tuesday, according to excerpts of his speech released ahead of time, "and only through a revolutionized higher education system can we equip all our people to fill those jobs."

James Pethokoukis, a scholar at the right-leaning American Enterprise Institute, said Rubio deserved credit for trying to develop an agenda that goes beyond criticizing President Barack Obama and the leading Democratic contender, Hillary Clinton.

But Pethokoukis, like several conservatives, was critical of Rubio's tax plan, which would simplify the federal tax code and offer new tax credits to families with children. Unlike some plans floated by Rubio's rivals, his plan would not significantly lower the top-tier income tax rates, though it would cut the corporate tax rate.

Rubio: College 'cartels' need busting in new economy // CNN // Tom LoBianco – July 7, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio says that Americans need to train for a new economy with new skills and that one of the first steps on that path requires busting the university "cartel" that trains students for outdated jobs.

"Our higher education system is controlled by what amounts to a cartel of existing colleges and universities, which use their power over the accreditation process to block innovative, low-cost competitors from entering the market," Rubio said. He made his conservative populist pitch to technology leaders in Chicago on Tuesday morning, shortly before he heads off to Iowa for a three-day campaign swing.

The Florida Republican has crafted an image as a younger alternative to Hillary Clinton -- which he continued Tuesday with jabs at "Clinton's time machine to yesterday" -- but also implicitly contrasts himself with another frontrunner, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

Rubio promised that he would change student-lending rules to allow private investors to pay for individual students to attend college and overhaul how colleges are accredited.

The concept of having individual donors fund students is being pushed by former Indiana Gov. Mitch Daniels. Daniels was appointed Purdue University president in 2012 by his appointees to the college's board of trustees, following an eight-year run in office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since then he has lobbied for sweeping conservative changes in higher education.

Daniels told Congress in March that students would have to repay the private loan through a portion of their income, but said that federal legislation would be needed.

Rubio co-sponsored the measure earlier this year which would establish the framework for the private donor concept and referenced it again Tuesday during his 20-minute speech.

Candidates from both parties have been highlighting student debt (and college costs) as a major problem, but have very different ideas for tackling the problem.

Rubio has had his own struggles with student debt, detailed at length in a New York Times investigation of his finances. Rubio started his political career, after graduating law school, with $150,000 in student loan debt, though he's since wiped that out.

Marco Rubio's 'New' Plan For Creating Jobs Is Actually Old And Borrowed // HuffPo // Igor Bobic – July 7, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) is casting himself as the youthful, forward-thinking presidential candidate of the future, a bold reformer awash with new ideas on how best to usher in a new American century.

The message is an overt criticism of Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, who Rubio says offers nothing more than a "time machine to yesterday" with a vision he calls "narrow and shortsighted."

Yet many of the Florida Republican's own proposals, outlined in a speech he delivered in Chicago on Tuesday, include ideas that Rubio and others have put forth before. That's not to say that the senator isn't bringing anything new to the table, but he is also touting his old proposals to draw a contrast with Clinton and, more implicitly, Republican rival Jeb Bush, another member of a political dynasty.

Right off the bat, Rubio proposed to "cut our corporate tax rate to be competitive with the average of 25 percent for developed nations." He promised to "establish a territorial tax system," and to "allow immediate, 100 percent expensing for businesses." And he said he would "put a ceiling on the amount U.S. regulations" cost the economy through regulatory reform.

The proposals are standard fare among lawmakers who have been calling for tax reform for years. In 2012, GOP presidential candidates Newt Gingrich and Rick Santorum both supported the expensing of business capital. However, Rubio's tax plan, which he introduced with Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah) earlier this year, ran into opposition from an unexpected quarter -- other Republicans. As New York Magazine's Jonathan Chait wrote in April, the tax cut Rubio proposed is "so gargantuan that nobody in the party actually believes it."

The senator also promised to reallocate more of the government's wireless spectrum for commercial use by forcing federal agencies to sell their frequencies to the highest bidder. He introduced a bill to do this in the Senate last year, attracting some bipartisan support. Congress has debated how to make more of the spectrum more widely available through incentives, but Rubio does appear to be one of the only lawmakers who supports doing so forcibly.

Meanwhile, Rubio said he would reform the nation's legal immigration system "to make it skill- and merit-based rather than family-based." Immigration activists worry such a focus would break up immigrant families. But the idea has roots in the sweeping, bipartisan immigration reform bill passed by the Senate that Rubio helped draft in 2013 -- and later renounced after taking heat from conservatives who opposed the bill's proposed path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants. The legislation would have created a merit-based visa program that would score each applicant on criteria such as employment status, geographic location and family considerations. It would have also increased the number of merit-based visas and green cards issued to keep the highest-skilled workers in the U.S.

The second half of Rubio's speech on job creation centered on ways to reform the country's education system. But most of the proposals rehashed his 2014 plan for higher education. The senator promised to bust the higher education "cartel" within his first 100 days in office by introducing "choice and competition" into the accreditation process. Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), a former Republican vice presidential nominee, proposed a similar overhaul in 2014. Like President Barack Obama, Rubio is also in favor of allowing students to get credentials outside of traditional universities and colleges.

Rubio said he would "make student loans more manageable by making Income-Based Repayment automatic for all graduates, so the more they make, the faster they pay back their loans; and the less they make, the less strain their loans cause." Former Rep. Tom Petri (R-Wis.) advocated the idea of automatic income-based loan repayment as far back as 1983.

The Florida senator also said he would expand apprenticeship programs to "provide on-the-job training and help standardize skills by allowing students to learn methods from experienced workers and spread them throughout the industry." Rubio already spoke about expanding apprentice programs last year, and Hillary Clinton called for a tax credit to benefit companies that hire people as apprentices last month. In his State of the Union address last year, Obama called for similar incentives to expand apprenticeship programs, and there is currently a bipartisan effort in Congress to do so.

Similarly, Rubio's proposal to require lending institutions to "tell students how much they can expect to earn with a given degree before they take out the loans to pay for it" already made headlines when he introduced a bill to do so alongside Sens. Mark R. Warner (D-Va.) and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) in 2013. Ditto for Rubio's "Student Investment Plan," which he unveiled last year and which would allow students to partner with corporate investors for tuition relief.

The new sheen fooled some news outlets, generating a wave of positive coverage for the candidate on Tuesday. "Marco Rubio has a wild plan to have investors pay for college and make money off students' future earnings," read a headline on Business Insider. Such a tactic, if it continues to be rewarded, may be just what the candidate needs in order to distinguish himself among a very crowded -- and more experienced -- Republican presidential field.

Rubio: Don't expect a Romney endorsem ent soon // The Hill // Jesse Byrnes – July 7, 2015

While Mitt Romney may have become the de facto standard bearer of the Republican Party following his 2012 White House nomination, an endorsement for any 2016 candidate is not on the horizon, Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) said Tuesday.
“No, I don't think that's fair to say," Rubio said in interview Tuesday on Fox Business Network when pressed whether Romney could be expected to endorse him.

"I don't suspect Governor Romney will endorse anyone in this race. He's someone I admire. He's someone that I like very much," Rubio added.
Host Neil Cavuto questioned Rubio about staying, along with his family, at Romney's New Hampshire home over the weekend. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, another 2016 GOP candidate, also stayed there with his family.
When Romney ended a brief public flirtation with his own 2016 bid early this year, he suggested that "one of our next generation of Republican leaders" would become the nominee, which many interpreted to be an implicit nod toward Rubio, now 44, the youngest candidate in the crowded GOP field led by former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, 62.
Romney and Bush reportedly met for lunch Monday with several members of their families in Maine, though Romney said last month he would likely not endorse a 2016 candidate until the Republican nominee is selected.
Rubio described conversations at the weekend sleepover as "pretty much non-political" Tuesday, saying of Romney's clan, "I wouldn't read too much into it. They're meeting with other people, and they've been very gracious with others as well."
Romney, after helping many Republicans secure midterm victories last year, has lately turned his attention to helping his party prepare for the lengthy 2016 presidential primary process and eventual general election.
During an appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press" last month, Romney mentioned Rubio, Bush, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and Ohio Gov. John Kasich by name, saying about a half-dozen candidates could be president.

Walker and Kasich have not entered the race officially yet, but both are expected to do so soon.
Romney also hosted Rubio, Walker and Kasich at a retreat in Park City, Utah, in June.

Marco Rubio 2016 Campaign: Nonprofit Backing GOP Candidate Rubio Raises Almost $16 Million // Latin Post // Andre Puglie – July 7, 2015

A nonprofit backing Marco Rubio has raised almost $16 million, parts of which the group plans to invest in television advertisements for the Republican Florida senator's 2016 White House bid,

According to Politico, The Conservative Solutions Project, which operates separately from Rubio's political-action committee, disclosed that it was on track to reaching its overall fundraising goal of $25 million.

"With more than $15.8 million raised already, Conservative Solutions Project is nearly two-thirds of the way to our overall fundraising goal," the nonprofit's president, Pat Shortridge, said in a statement.
He added, "These funds will allow us to continue the fight to restore our military and our nation's role in the world, and given the recent news about the nation's stagnant economy, advocate for conservative solutions to an inefficient tax code and education reform so all Americans have a chance to pursue their dreams."

Conservative Solutions, which has already spent $1 million on television commercials, said on Monday it would boost its advertising campaign to a total of $3.3 million, according to CNN. Some of the group's early spots, the advertisements focused on Rubio's attacks on the Obama administration's proposed nuclear deal with Iran, an issue The New York Times called "critical" for some of the most generous GOP donors.
The group's announcement reveals that Rubio is "the biggest beneficiary so far of a new and largely untested means for moving unlimited cash into presidential primary campaigns," The New York Times noted.

Meanwhile, the Conservative Solutions Project is taking care of many activities typically carried out by a formal presidential campaign, and that includes what the paper called "extensive research on the Republican primary electorate."

Supporters of other contenders in the increasingly crowded field for the Republican nomination -- including former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee -- have set up similar groups and used them as "de facto campaigns prior to their kickoff events," CNN noted.

Nonprofit with secret donors, linked to Rubio super PAC, raises millions // CBS News // Stephanie Condon – July 7, 2015

A relatively new nonprofit -- with the same name as a pro-Marco Rubio super PAC -- has raised nearly $16 million to spend on issue-related ads in the 2016 election, the New York Times reports.

The robust fundraising haul illustrates how 2016 presidential candidates like Rubio may benefit from the new crop of secretive nonprofits that are playing a growing role in elections, thanks to a series of relatively recent court rulings.

The organization Conservative Solutions Project has already spent $3.3 million on television and radio advertising, the Times reports, focusing on Rubio's attacks of the Obama administration's Iran nuclear negotiations. However, the group told the Times that it's not devoted to any particular candidate.

As a tax-exempt "social welfare" organization -- in the 501(c)(4) category -- the group is allowed to spend unlimited sums of money on politics as long as politics isn't its main focus. That's why its advertising will be largely "issue based."

In most cases, these "social welfare" nonprofits aren't required to name their donors. A spokesman for Conservative Solutions Project told the Times it is unlikely to publicly name its donors.

The secretive nature of these groups has created the potential for corruption, several public advocacy groups and politicians have argued. While Congress hasn't done much about the rise of these "dark money" groups, leaders at the state level -- both Democrats and Republicans -- are trying to rein them in.

Marco Rubio: "We need a new president for a new age" // CBS News // Sopan Deb – July 7, 2015

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio pitched himself as the presidential candidate of the future in a speech Tuesday, arguing he's better equipped than his rivals to govern a rapidly transforming and innovating America.

Rubio's choice of venue for the speech - his first major domestic policy address since he announced his presidential campaign - was no accident. He spoke at 1871, an incubator for digital start-ups in Chicago.

In his speech, Rubio, the second-youngest candidate in the GOP field at 43 years old, framed himself as the human embodiment of 1871 -- the only presidential candidate in the field with the perspective needed to lead the country in the 21st century. Even the title of the speech -- "Jobs For A New American Century" -- hinted at Rubio's forward-looking message.

"For the first fifteen and a half years of this century, Washington has looked to the past," Rubio said. "Our economy has changed, but our economic policies have not. And we have learned, painfully, that the old ways no longer work - that Washington cannot pretend the world is the same as it was in the '80s, it cannot raise taxes like it did in the '90s, and it cannot grow government like it did in the 2000s."

"We need a new president for a new age," he added. "One with original ideas to unlock the two great doors to the future: the doors of innovation and education."

Much of the speech laid out his platform on the economy and education.

Rubio proposed cutting the corporate tax rate to make the U.S. "competitive with the average of 25 percent for developed nations." He called for establishing a "territorial tax system," which he said would bring money back to the economy held overseas by companies not wanting to be taxed on foreign income. Critics allege that territorial taxing would encourage companies to increase capital abroad, which would then lower wages back home.

Rubio cited several specific technologies on the horizon - self-driving cars, virtual reality, robotics - but said that we have "quite nearly the exact opposite" of a business-friendly economy. He noted that U.S. corporate taxes are the highest in the developed world -- a claim that fact-checking organization Politifact has rated mostly true. The U.S. has the highest statutory tax rate and the second highest effective rate, among advanced industrialized nations.

At one point, Rubio managed to get a laugh from the 100 or so attendees in the audience (some sporting Marco Rubio t-shirts) by joking that self-driving cars would be great for him, considering recent news reports. It was a clear nod to a recent New York Times piece that explored his family's checkered driving history.

In his single reference to immigration policy, Rubio called for a shift to a system based on merit - designed to attract the world's best and brightest workers - rather than a system based on familial relations. He did not mention his past support for a comprehensive immigration bill that includes a path to citizenship -- a stance that has earned plaudits from immigrant and Latino groups but one that has put him at odds with most of the rest of the Republican primary field.

On the subject of education, Rubio proposed tackling the growing problem of higher education debt by making income-based repayment automatic for all graduates. He wasn't clear on whether this would include only federal loans. He also raised the idea of Student Investment Plans, which would allow investors to pay the cost of tuition for students and then take a cut of the students' salary after college.

He didn't target any of his Republican primary opponents by name, but focused his criticism on Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton.

"The race for the future will never be won by going backward," Rubio said. "It will never be won by hopping in Hillary Clinton's time machine to yesterday. She seems to believe pumping more of today's money into yesterday's programs will bring prosperity tomorrow."

Rubio called for expanding access to vocational schools as early as high school -- a proposal on which he and Clinton might be able to find common ground. Last year, at Arizona State University, Clinton called for the country to "get back to really respecting vocational and technical work."

The Senator raced off to Iowa after the speech for a busy couple days of campaigning. The trip marks Rubio's third visit to Iowa, site of the nation's first presidential nominating contest, in 2015.

Of his previous two trips, one occurred after he announced his candidacy and one came in February on a book tour. Rubio's first event in Iowa this time will occur in Des Moines at the Exile Brewing Company. He'll hold a happy hour with the Bull Moose Club, a forum for Iowa Republicans under the age of 40, and he's hoping he'll find a receptive audience for his message about the generational divide.

Of the GOP's 2016 candidates, only retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum have addressed the group thus far this cycle.

Marco Rubio's Economic Plan Calls For Students T o Sell T hemselves To Private Investors // Think Progress // Alice Ollstein – July 7, 2015

Florida Senator and Republican presidential candidate Marco Rubio described his economic platform in a speech Tuesday in Chicago, touching on well-worn GOP priorities including slashing corporate taxes from 35 to 25 percent, further deregulating the private sector, restricting family immigration, and resisting calls to raise the minimum wage. Taking several specific shots at Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton, Rubio said his plan would avoid "pumping more of today's money into yesterday's programs," and bring the U.S. into the future.

In the speech, Rubio also called for a "revolutionized" higher education system. If elected president, he promised to "bust…the cartel of existing colleges and universities" by loosening the rules for accreditation so that "innovative, low-cost competitors" can court students. But critics say the government accreditation process is already far too loose, allowing predatory for-profit chains like Corinthian Colleges to win federal approval and funding even as they mislead students into paying for essentially worthless degrees.

He also touted the "Student Right to Know Before You Go Act" he co-sponsored with Oregon Democrat Ron Wyden — a plan extremely similar to one President Obama pushed for last year that ranks colleges by how much their tuition costs and how much money their graduates make.

Lamenting the "shadow of debt hovering over millions of graduates," Rubio then proposed a model already suggested by his rival Governor Chris Christie (R-NJ): allowing rich individuals or hedge funds to pay a students tuition and collect their investment back post-graduation.

“It may result in a profit for the investor or it may not – but unlike with loans, none of the risk lies with the student,” Rubio said.

He expanded on this idea in a speech last year:

Let’s say you are a student who needs $10,000 to pay for your last year of school. Instead of taking this money out in the form of a loan, you could apply for a “Student Investment Plan” from an approved and certified private investment group. In short, these investors would pay your $10,000 tuition in return for a percentage of your income for a set period of time after graduation – let’s say, for example, 4% a year for 10 years.

This group would look at factors such as your major, the institution you’re attending, your record in school – and use this to make a determination about the likelihood of you finding a good job and paying them back.

Unlike with loans, you would be under no legal obligation to pay back that entire $10,000. Your only obligation would be to pay that 4% of your income per year for 10 years, regardless of whether that ends up amounting to more or less than $10,000.
But these “Student Investment Plans,” which also have the Orwellian name “human capital contracts,” raise many serious concerns. For one, investors may refuse to cover entire fields of students not likely to bring in the big bucks after graduation, or would charge them a staggeringly high percentage of their income. For those backing this plan, such as the conservative think tank American Enterprise Institute (AEI), this poses no problem.

“Isn’t this ‘unfair’ to those wanting to be librarians, teachers, social workers, etc., since they would have to forego more of their incomes to satisfy the human capital contract? Not really,” writes AEI Adjunct Scholar Richard Vedder. “Society puts a relatively low value on those jobs.”

Additionally, following Rubio’s math of 4 percent over 10 years, a graduate would have to earn an extremely low salary for the investor not to make a profit. Vedder and other advocates of the plan are less cautious, and have voiced support for plans that take as high as 25 percent of a graduates salary for multiple decades after they enter the workforce.

The National College Access Network and other groups have warned that such a plan could cost students even more than high-interest federal loan programs, diverting away money those graduates could have used to save for retirement or buy a house.

Rubio’s proposal is similar to the “Pay It Forward, Pay It Back” model currently being explored by the state of Oregon — with one crucial difference. In Oregon’s plan, the investor is the democratically-elected state government, so when graduates repay their loans that money can go back into public education. Under Rubio’s version, the money would go into the pockets of investors.

Marco Rubio Out lines Domestic Policy Agenda, Jabs Clinton // NBC News // Alex Jaffe – July 7, 2015

In his first domestic policy-focused speech since announcing his bid for president, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio on Tuesday outlined his vision for tax and higher education reform to usher in a "New American Century" marked by innovation and prosperity.

The GOP presidential candidate told the audience at a digital startup co-working space in Chicago that while the future may look bleak today, his proposals would ensure America remains competitive globally.

And he took direct aim at Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton, framing her as a backward-looking foil to his forward-focused agenda.

"The race for the future will never be won by going backward. It will never be won by hopping in Hillary Clinton's time machine to yesterday," Rubio told the crowd. "She seems to believe pumping more of today's money into yesterday's programs will bring prosperity tomorrow."

The Florida senator said technological innovation and globalization has created a situation in which "the path to the middle class is narrower today than it has been for generations, and the American Dream so many achieved in the last century is in peril."

Higher-education "cartels" are a key inhibitor of upward mobility, he said, pledging to overhaul the system in the first 100 days of his presidency by "establishing a new accreditation process that welcomes low-cost, innovative providers."

A President Rubio would also require schools to tell students how much they can expect to earn from their degrees, and expand access to career and vocational schools as well as apprenticeship programs for training on the job.

In his remarks, he outlined a broad array of domestic reforms, from an overhaul of the business tax code to reforming the legal immigration system to bring in more high-skilled workers.

He argued in particular against raising the minimum wage, which he said "will accelerate automation and outsourcing" rather than improve the quality of life for Americans.

Instead, Rubio proposes cutting the corporate tax rate to be competitive with the average 25 percent rate for developed countries, creating a "territorial tax system" to prevent businesses from being taxed twice on profits, and allowing businesses to take deductions on 100 percent of the funds they invest back into business development and employee wages.

He also called for "reforming our legal immigration system to make it skill- and merit-based rather than family-based, which will protect American workers and attract more talent to grow our economy and create jobs."

The speech marked Rubio's reemergence on the campaign trail after weeks spent bogged down in Senate business on Capitol Hill and fundraising jaunts across the nation. Rubio's campaign has yet to announce how much the aggressive fundraising schedule earned his campaign, although a key outside group backing him announced Monday that it has raised $15.8 million to date. In the latest NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, 14 percent of Republican primary voters identified him as their first choice for the nomination, placing him behind rivals Jeb Bush and Scott Walker.

But the speech, along with his campaign swing through Iowa and Nevada in the coming days, is meant to catapult him back into the race and again highlight what Rubio's aides and allies see as his greatest asset -- his youthful appeal and unique personal narrative, in a field of older GOP candidates.

PAUL

Rand Paul, dorm room philosopher: Why his "slavery" nonsense is so outrageous // Salon // Simon Maloy – July 7, 2015

Presidential candidate Sen. Rand Paul has a tax plan he'd like to sell you on. The plan, which would put in place a 14.5 percent flat tax, was crafted with the input of some of the wrongest people in the conservative economic policy world, and it would redistribute wealth up the economic ladder while tossing a bone or two to the people at the bottom. But Rand is proud of it nonetheless, mainly because he thinks it's less slavery-like than your average tax scheme.

Here's what Paul said last week about taxation and "freedom," as reported by BuzzFeed:

"Now you can have some government, we all need government," the Kentucky senator said while discussing Thomas Paine and the role of government at the local public library. "Thomas Paine said that government is a necessary evil. What did he mean by that?"

Paul said he believes that "you have to give up some of your liberty to have government," saying he was "for some government."

"I'm for paying some taxes," continued Paul. "But if we tax you at 100% then you've got zero percent liberty. If we tax you at 50% you are half slave, half free. I frankly would like to see you a little freer and a little more money remaining in your communities so you can create jobs. It's a debate we need to have."

That was his big pitch – The Rand Paul tax plan: Only 14.5 percent slavery!

This is a dumb argument. And it's upsetting to hear this dumb argument coming from someone who is trying to be president, but will go back to writing and approving legislation if/when that doesn't work out. Taxation is not tantamount to slavery. The only thing that's comparable to slavery is actual slavery. You might not like it that a portion of your paycheck is sent to the feds and your state government, and you may disagree with how your tax dollars are spent, but that is in no way comparable to being kept in bondage and having the fruits of your labor stolen from you.

Any way you look at this argument, it's bad. When you've staked out the position that your effective tax rate is how you measure one's slave status, then you're arguing that a progressive tax structure means rich people are less free than the lucky poor folks who would see a smaller percentage of their income go to the government. By this reading, a hedge fund billionaire who moves his assets offshore to avoid paying taxes is basically Frederick

Douglass. And when you refer to something as slavery, how can you then make the case that there is an acceptable threshold for it? Why should 14.5 percent slavery be any more tolerable than 100 percent slavery?

It gets even worse when you remember that Rand Paul is trying to make inroads with black voters and repair his party's abysmally bad reputation with African-Americans. Rand obviously understands at a certain level that slavery was a uniquely horrific crime, the memory of which still haunts our politics. After the shootings in Charleston last month, Paul called for the Confederate flag to be removed from grounds of the South Carolina Capitol because "to every African-American in the country it's a symbolism of slavery to them and now it's a symbol of murder to this young man." Here we are, just a couple of weeks later, and he's comparing the grotesque human rights violations represented by that flag to the banal act of filing your annual tax return.

And this isn't Rand Paul's first foray into comparing policies he disagrees with to slavery. In 2011, during a Senate hearing, he said that a "right to healthcare" would, in effect, make slaves out of doctors such as himself:

With regard to the idea whether or not you have a right to health care you have to realize what that implies. I am a physician. You have a right to come to my house and conscript me. It means you believe in slavery. You are going to enslave not only me but the janitor at my hospital, the person who cleans my office, the assistants, the nurses. … You are basically saying you believe in slavery.

On the flip side of the "slavery" argument, Paul argued earlier this year that the vaccination of children was "an issue of freedom," essentially saying that parents should be free to have their kids be vectors for the communication of dangerous disease. (Before he was elected to the Senate, Paul went on Alex Jones' radio show and warned that mandatory vaccinations were a precursor to martial law.)

Rand's been espousing this strain of dorm-room libertarianism for quite some time, reducing complex policy issues to black-and-white questions of "freedom" and "slavery." He and others like him who carp on the slavery of taxes and the tyranny of public health promotion are an obvious source of frustration to other libertarians who would very much prefer that the public faces of the "Libertarian Moment" stop making asses of themselves by cheapening the horror of America's slave past.

CRUZ

Blogging Federal Judge Says Ted Cruz 'Not Fit to be President' // WSJ // Jacob Gershman – July 7, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ted Cruz raised eyebrows with his idea of giving voters the power to oust Supreme Court justices from the bench.

One federal judge says he's so offended by the Texas senator's proposal that he thinks it should disqualify him from the White House.

That's the opinion of U.S. District Judge Richard Kopf of Nebraska, a part-time blogger who has attracted his own share of controversy.

"Mr. Cruz seeks to sacrifice the Supreme Court upon the altar of an extreme right-wing ideology. That makes him unsuited to become President," wrote Judge Kopf on his personal blog, "Hercules and the Umpire." He titled his post, "Senator Ted Cruz is not fit to be President."

He was responding to Mr. Cruz's proposal for a constitutional amendment that would end life tenure for Supreme Court justices and force the justices to face periodic judicial-retention elections to keep their jobs. The Harvard-educated Texas senator, who once clerked for Chief Justice William Rehnquist, said the court's recent rulings on Obamacare and gay marriage rulings were examples of lawless judicial activism that retention elections would help to cure.

Rick Tyler, a spokesman for Mr. Cruz's campaign, took issue with Judge Kopf's characterization of the senator's ideology. In a statement emailed to Law Blog on Tuesday, he said:

Senator Cruz cares deeply about The Supreme Court…He respects and admires many of the Justices, some are his friends. He did not come to his conclusion about retention elections lightly. Quite the opposite. He wrote a thoughtful essay on why he believed it was necessary. He understands and respects why some would disagree. But what evidence does the judge offer to back up his assertion of "extreme right-wing ideology"? Or is he accustomed to render his verdicts without substantiation.

Over at Volokh Conspiracy, attorney and law professor Orin Kerr wonders whether Judge Kopf crossed a line:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Whatever one thinks of the substance of Kopf's argument — both as to the proposal and the candidate — I'm more interested in the ethical questions it raises. Canon 5 of the Code of Conduct for Federal Judges states:

A judge should not . . . publicly endorse or oppose a candidate for public office[.]

Does calling a candidate for public office "unfit" and "demonstrably unsuited" for that office amount to "oppos[ing] a candidate for public office"?

Judge Kopf responded to Mr. Kerr, saying he had a legal right to express that opinion:

For me, it is enough to state that I did not label Senator Cruz unfit to serve in order to oppose his candidacy for political or partisan purposes but rather to demolish and protect us all from his intemperate legal attacks on the Supreme Court. I remind you that I am not registered to vote, and I have not been registered to vote since I became a judge in 1987. My comment on his legal fitness was inextricably intertwined with my right to speak publicy on legal matters and the administration of justice. That said you are correct that I skated close to thin ice.

Blogging judge calls political candidate "unfit" for office // WSJ // Orin Kerr – July 7, 2015

U.S. District Judge Richard Kopf is no stranger to controversy. At his personal blog, Hercules and the Umpire, Judge Kopf has over time shared his somewhat intemperate criticism of the Supreme Court, other judges, Congress, and lawyers practicing before him. His posts have generated no shortage of national press attention.

In a recent post, Kopf may have added another controversial notch to his blogging belt by proclaiming a political candidate "not fit" for office. In response to recent Supreme Court decisions, Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) has proposed a constitutional amendment that would require Supreme Court justices to face periodic retention elections. Judge Kopf argues that Cruz's attack on lifetime tenure reveals Cruz as "a right-wing ideologue" who "is demonstrably unfit to become President." In Kopf's view, it's obvious that lifetime tenure for federal judges is better than a system of retention elections. To argue otherwise would "sacrifice the Supreme Court upon the altar of an extreme right-wing ideology." "[A]s a federal judge," Kopf writes, that gives him "the right . . . and dare I say the duty, to respond to the proposal." Cruz's proposal is so bad, Kopf reasons, that it makes Cruz "unsuited to become President."

Whatever one thinks of the substance of Kopf's argument — both as to the proposal and the candidate — I'm more interested in the ethical questions it raises. Canon 5 of the Code of Conduct for Federal Judges states:

A judge should not . . . publicly endorse or oppose a candidate for public office[.]

Does calling a candidate for public office "unfit" and "demonstrably unsuited" for that office amount to "oppos[ing] a candidate for public office"?

In response to commenter who raises this concern, Judge Kopf argues that he did not violate Canon 5 because he was merely exercising his right to comment on public matters:

For me, it is enough to state that I did not label Senator Cruz unfit to serve in order to oppose his candidacy for political or partisan purposes but rather to demolish and protect us all from his intemperate legal attacks on the Supreme Court. I remind you that I am not registered to vote, and I have not been registered to vote since I became a judge in 1987. My comment on his legal fitness was inextricably intertwined with my right to speak publicy on legal matters and the administration of justice. That said you are correct that I skated close to thin ice.

He adds:

If Senator's Cruz's legal proposition was beyond the pale, and I have the right under the Code of Conduct to write on legal subjects, why is that I am prohibited from concluding that his legal assertions disqualify him from public office? It seems to me that the two things are inextricably linked. I find it impossible to honestly separate the speaker from the speech in this instance.

And further:

I might add that I stand by views after serving six years on the Judicial Conference's Codes of Conduct Committee. That hardly makes me right, but it does reflect a serious study of the Code of the Conduct for United States Judges.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Has Kopf skated close to thin ice, as he says, or has he skated over it and fallen through? Kopf was of course free to comment on the merits of Cruz's proposal. (For what it's worth, I agree that Cruz's proposal is a bad idea; I personally favor 18-year terms for Justices.) But I would think that the ethical line is actually pretty clear. The ethics canons allow judges to publicly oppose a reform proposal but do not allow them to publicly oppose a candidate for public office. The two may be related from the perspective of voters, as presumably they would want to vote against a candidate with bad ideas. Or at least they would weigh a bad idea against a candidate when they decide who among the candidates in the race they should support. But I don't think the two are intertwined for the judges who have to follow the ethics canons.

Or so it seems to me. I'd be interested to know whether others agree or disagree.

UPDATE: Judge Kopf elaborates a bit on his position in the comment thread to his post:

[W]hen a man of Senator Cruz's education and experience calls for a radical and fundamental attack on the Supreme Court he is not acting in political terms. If he is really serious about the amendment he is a threat to the judiciary that I love and respect and have devoted much of my life to serving. Therefore, his unfitness is a function of his threat to our Constitutional form of government–it is in that sense that he is acting in an extra-political manner and that extra-political action entitles me to take the public position that I have taken about his unfitness.

This reads like an explanation of why it's worth it to violate Canon 5 rather than why it's not a violation in the first place.

ANOTHER UPDATE: In a new comment thread, Judge Kopf argues that he did not violate Canon 5 at all. He writes, with emphasis in the original:

I neither publicly endorsed nor publicly opposed Mr. Cruz for a public office. Rather, I wrote that Senator Cruz "was unfit." "Oppose" is a verb. "Unfit" is an adjective. While the words are similar, they are not in any sense the same.

I appreciate the response, but I don't get this as an argument. First, I don't think it takes a specific verb to oppose someone. Second, when you say someone is "unfit for public office," I have always understood that to mean "should not be in public office." I don't see how you can say someone should not be in public office without opposing them for that office. Third, in defending his position Kopf also wrote:

If Senator's Cruz's legal proposition was beyond the pale, and I have the right under the Code of Conduct to write on legal subjects, why is that I am prohibited from concluding that his legal assertions disqualify him from public office? It seems to me that the two things are inextricably linked. I find it impossible to honestly separate the speaker from the speech in this instance.

I read that as Judge Kopf saying that Cruz's views "disqualify him from public office." I don't see how you can argue that a politician's views "disqualify him from public office" without also opposing that politician's bid to the office.

Ted Cruz's angry allies // Politico // Katie Glueck – July 7, 2015

Ted Cruz has methodically built a roster of state leaders to help him fire up social conservatives in the South. He may have gotten more than he bargained for.

In the last month alone, three of his state co-chairs have drawn fire over comments related to everything from Sharia law to the victims of the African-American church shooting in Charleston, S.C. That dynamic was thrown into sharp relief in recent weeks, as the debate in South Carolina unfolded over whether to take down the Confederate flag from the statehouse grounds.

One state co-chair said the victims of the Charleston shooting "waited their turn to be shot." Another has emerged as the voice of the opposition to removing the rebel flag from the statehouse, likening that effort to a "Stalinist purge." Separately, in Tennessee, his state chairman had once accused a Muslim state appointee of being a "Shariah compliant finance expert," a comment that sparked outrage in some corners when he was tapped for the position with Cruz in early June.

When asked about his surrogates' inflammatory comments, the Cruz campaign had their backs.

Friday — to be removed from the grounds of the state house in Columbia. Once flown by the rebel army of the slave-owning South, the confederate flag is seen by some as a symbol of regional heritage, but by many more as an ugly reminder of racism's cruel legacy.

“They are respected in their states, they are terrific organizers, they are working hard to help win the nomination and we have every confidence they have the ability to do that,” said Cruz spokesman Rick Tyler.

Their ability to hold their tongues is more in doubt.

On Monday, South Carolina state Sen. Lee Bright, the co-chair who is a leading opponent of taking down the flag, generated headlines and raised eyebrows in South Carolina and beyond when he gave a vehement floor speech opposing the flag removal. In the address, he warned that “the devil is taking control of this land” and went on an anti-gay rights tangent, calling the pro-gay rainbow symbol the “abomination colors.”
(Cruz’s campaign has said he believes the flag is a state issue.)

“I don’t know how that helps,” said Chip Felkel, a prominent longtime Republican operative who lives in Bright’s district, of the implications of the state senator’s remarks for Cruz. “It’s guilt by association.”

Despite Bright’s efforts, the Senate voted this week, 36-3, to take the flag down. The state House of Representatives takes the bill up next. State Rep. Bill Chumley, another Cruz co-chair who will be voting in the House, has also indicated opposition to removing the flag. He was the one to comment on the Charleston victims, a remark for which he has since apologized.

“These gentlemen — a term I’d use loosely at this point — maybe they feel they represent their constituents, but the train has left the station, it’s time to turn the page and they are not doing themselves or Sen. Cruz any favors,” continued Felkel, who worked for George W. Bush but is currently unaffiliated in the presidential race. “The longer this is drawn out, the uglier it gets, [with] national implications. Every one of these guys are looking at who’s on their team, who their supporters are and that’s going to carry over to other states. I think it cannot be a positive based on how this is playing out in the media.”

The backlash was made more clear this week in the early-voting state of Iowa. On Monday, GOP Chairman Jeff Kaufmann told Radio Iowa, while speaking about a local incident involving the flag, that he “will not tolerate” having it connected to the GOP.

“There are 17,000 young Iowa men that are laying in graves that fought against that very flag and everything it stood for,” Kaufmann said. “There’s really not a lot of conversation to have about that.”

But Cruz’s spokesman said that “of course” the campaign stands behind Chumley and Bright, in addition to Kevin Kookogey, the Tennessee state chair.

Regarding Bright, Tyler said, “He’s an elected official, a state senator, you have to garner a certain amount of support to be an elected state senator…he has agreed to do this on behalf of the senator and we are grateful for it.”

Bright, who represents the conservative Upstate region, mounted an unsuccessful primary challenge to Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) last cycle. In 2012, he was former Rep. Michele Bachmann’s South Carolina chair (Chumley also worked for her), and then switched his allegiances to Ron Paul after she dropped out.

“I would encourage presidential candidates to let us deal with this,” Bright said of the flag issue in an interview with POLITICO last month. “It’s deeply rooted history for a lot of us. I’m not going to stand by and let our ancestors’ memories be besmirched. It’s one thing to just take down the flag. They want us to concede that the soldiers that fell for the Confederacy were a bunch of racists, and I’m not going to concede that.”

When South Carolina’s Republican leadership first called for the flag to come down late last month, following the Charleston shooting, Cruz’s campaign said the senator would leave the flag issue to the state. His campaign maintained that position Tuesday following the Senate vote. That position stands out in a GOP field where many other presidential contenders lauded the state officials’ efforts to take it down.

“It’s a state issue, let them resolve it,” Tyler said. Bright “is a South Carolinian…it’s completely appropriate he argues the point of view he has. I don’t think it prevailed, but he argued it.”

Cruz is used to being out of step with the Republican establishment — his 2013 spearheading of a government shutdown, and his support for a group that primaried GOP incumbents in 2014, cemented that dynamic. And his position on the Confederate flag in South Carolina, along with his alliance with Bright, ensures that he’s at odds with the GOP leadership of South Carolina, too, note some Palmetto State operatives.

“A lot of people Cruz has associated himself with are extraordinarily wrong on the flag,” said a senior South Carolina Republican official. “…There’s no depth he won’t stoop to to pander. He’s not well-liked by the Republican establishment, and this is more confirmation of that."

Of course, Cruz isn't trying to win over the establishment. Plenty of his deeply conservative supporters are energized by people, like Cruz's Tennessee chair, who promise to take on Sharia law. And in South Carolina, there remains a pocket of Republican voters who do not want to see the Confederate flag come down, though it's not clear how large that group is. Other Republican presidential candidates, who supported Gov. Nikki Haley in her call for the flag to come down, may have alienated those voters — but Cruz hasn't.

"From his standpoint, it's not bad politics," said someone working for a rival campaign. "...If you look at, how do you distinguish yourself in a crowded field, in a state as important as South Carolina, that would be one way of doing it. As a long-term strategy, it may be short-sighted, but they are playing the short game."

It's not just the establishment calling for the flag to come down, though. Prominent Christian conservatives, including leading Southern Baptists, have also taken that position.

Glenn McCall, South Carolina's Republican National Committeeman and a supporter of bringing the flag down, said he thinks that at on the national stage, the flag issue may blow over by the time of the primary. But at least at a state level, he said, those who don't back bringing down the flag are losing a chance to embrace Christian unity. "Those supporting him will support him, those supporting other folks are not going to change their opinion one way or another," he said of Cruz. But at a state level, among those who oppose taking the flag down, "I just hate that they're missing an opportunity — they're all missing an opportunity — to stand with their brothers and sisters in the faith."

Ted Cruz partners with donor's 'psychographic' firm // Politico // Kenneth Vogel & Tarini Parti – July 7, 2015

Ted Cruz's presidential effort is working closely with a little-known company owned by one of his biggest donors that uses non-traditional "psychographic" analyses of voters to try to win them over with narrowly targeted micro-messages, POLITICO has learned.

The company, Cambridge Analytica, has sent staff to Cruz's campaign headquarters in Houston to help set up an intensive data analysis operation.

Cambridge Analytica is connected to a British firm called SCL Group that provides governments, political groups and companies around the world with services ranging from military disinformation campaigns to social media branding and voter targeting.

So far, SCL's political work has been mostly in the developing world – where it has boasted of its ability to help foment coups. Cambridge Analytica only entered the competitive U.S. political data market last year.

Cambridge Analytica is owned at least in part by the family of the press shy New York hedge fund manager Robert Mercer, multiple sources confirmed to POLITICO. The Mercers this year provided the lion's share of the $37 million raised by a quartet of unlimited money super PACs supporting Cruz's campaign for the GOP presidential nomination. Cruz's presidential campaign has contracted with Cambridge Analytica to provide data services, and the company has had talks with at least one of those super PACs, according to sources.

It's not uncommon for political campaigns, parties and PACs to pay huge contracts for data and other services to companies affiliated with their consultants. But it's less common for such contracts to go to firms affiliated with the donors funding the whole enterprise.

Cruz spokesman Rick Tyler said the campaign's Director of Research and Analytics Chris Wilson is using Cambridge Analytica to build models that identify and sort persuadable voters in early primary states by six-key personality types, which will be used to target the campaign's outreach.

"I've seen their product and its better than anything I've ever seen," said Tyler. "We know what a Cruz supporter looks like demographically ... and this allows us to go into Iowa and match those traits with likely caucus goers."

The group of super PACs supporting Cruz, Keep the Promise, did not respond to questions about their arrangements with Cambridge Analytica. The company did not respond to interview requests, while a spokesman for the Mercer family declined to comment.

In recent years, the Mercer family – Robert Mercer, his wife Diana Mercer and their daughter Rebekah Mercer – have emerged as among the leading financiers of conservative causes and candidates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Their quiet involvement in Cambridge Analytica – which is known in elite conservative finance circles but has yet to be reported – seems to mark a transition from purely financing political campaigns to running their own political operation. It's a model that's been pursued to varying degrees by billionaires ranging from the liberal hedge funder Tom Steyer to the conservative industrialists Charles and David Koch. It was made possible partly by the Supreme Court's 2010 Citizens United decision that opened new avenues for unlimited political spending.

With their investment in Cambridge Analytica – and the Cruz campaign's embrace of their product – the Mercers also have become competitors in an increasingly cut-throat conservative political data race. Some of the right's most influential and well-funded players — including the Koch brothers' operation and the Republican National Committee — are jockeying for market share and 2016 prospects in a political sub-industry expected to consume a huge portion of the billions spent in the campaign. The result of the competition could go a long way towards determining the winner of the White House and the Republican Party's direction after the election.

So far, most of Cambridge Analytica's work appears to have come from campaigns and committees funded in large part by the Mercers. And sources familiar with the Mercer's political efforts said that Rebekah Mercer, who has steered the family's political expansion, has made introductions between Cambridge Analytica and the political committees the family supports.

Federal Election Commission filings show that nearly 93 percent of the $2.6 million Cambridge Analytica has received in traceable federal payments have come from committees to which the Mercers donated generously. The payments – which all came last year and were for polling, micro-targeting, advertising and other services – came from Cruz's leadership PAC and a handful of GOP-aligned big-money organizations, including Ending Spending Action Fund, former U.N. Ambassador John Bolton's super PAC and a pop-up super PAC created to boost 2014 Republican Senate candidates.

Other Cambridge Analytica clients included the campaigns of GOP Sens. Tom Cotton of Arkansas and Thom Tillis of North Carolina, as well as unsuccessful GOP House candidate Art Robinson of Oregon. The Mercers combined to donate nearly $3.3 million to those groups in 2014, according to FEC filings.

Representatives from most of the groups and campaigns did not respond to questions about whether there was any connection between their support from the Mercers and their payments to Cambridge Analytica.

Garrett Marquis, a spokesman for Bolton's super PAC, said the $340,000 his group paid to Cambridge Analytica in 2014 was money well spent.

"It's something that no one has done in politics. Period," said Marquis. "It was the most cost-effective, efficient way to reach voters. We were very pleased."

Marquis said the firm created five categories of potential voters, including "soccer mom" and "working dads," by layering responses to surveys atop voter data, and then targeted voters based on which category they fell in. The firm's "core offering," according to its website, "combines advanced data analytics and the creation of a psychographic framework to help you gain increased insight into your target voter groups."

Bolton's super PAC spent $5 million on digital ads in 2014 on key Senate races, and Cambridge Analytica boasts on its website that the online and Direct TV ad campaign it ran for Bolton's super PAC appealed "directly to the personality traits, priority issues and demographics of specific groups" that "had a real impact in sending Thom Tillis to the US Senate."

It's not clear precisely which services Cruz's campaign or its supportive super PACs will purchase from Cambridge Analytica, or how much the work will cost. Those committees won't be required to publicly detail their finances until later this month.

Some of Cambridge Analytica's employees already appear to be have been dispatched to work on Cruz's campaign. One described himself on a social media page as a systems administrator for SCL Elections who was working in Houston "Providing Infrastructure Administration for The Honourable Republican Senator Ted Cruz in the 2016 Presidential Campaign."

SCL Group's director, a Brit named Alexander Nix, has worked to expand Cambridge Analytica's market share in the deep-pocketed world of Washington-based conservative outside groups, offering a data service that targets individual voters based on a "psychographic score" of personality traits.

"It sounds ridiculous and it probably is," said one GOP operative who has worked closely with organizations using the service.

The company is one of 10 startups set to participate this month in the Reboot Conference – a major political technology event – in San Francisco. Conference organizers included Cambridge Analytica among participants they consider "up and coming companies with technology not to be missed".

Ted Cruz To Chris Christie: Your "Oppo Research Guys" Got The Facts Wrong When You Attacked Me // Buzzfeed // Andrew Kaczynski – July 7, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ted Cruz said Tuesday that fellow candidate Chris Christie's "oppo research guys" got their facts wrong when the New Jersey governor attacked Cruz during a Fox News appearance.

Christie, addressing comments Cruz made about not believing in "Republican-on Republican violence," said on Fox News Monday that he didn't "need to be lectured by Ted Cruz." Cruz made those comments when asked to comment on Donald Trump's controversial remarks on Mexican immigrants.

"I find it ironic that Ted Cruz is giving lectures on Republican-on-Republican violence," the New Jersey governor said on Fox News Monday. "The guy who put together a group that was sponsoring primary ads against Sen. Lamar Alexander is giving us – the rest of us lectures on Republican on Republican violence. With all due respect, I don't need to be lectured by Ted Cruz."

Cruz hit back at Christie Tuesday, saying his comments were factually wrong and adding that he "disagreed" with Christie's choice to attack other Republicans.

"Well listen, I like Chris Christie, I have repeatedly praised Chris Christie — indeed, I've repeatedly and vocally defended Chris Christie from what I think are unfair and ridiculous attacks and charges on the whole Bridgegate thing, which I've said is water under the bridge," Cruz said on the Mike Gallagher Radio.

"You know, he can choose to say what he wants to say, you know — I do appreciate his kind efforts to highlight that I have consistently worked hard to elect conservatives to Congress," said Cruz. "It is interesting his oppo research guys got the facts wrong, because I did not actually get involved in Lamar Alexander's race."

Christie was citing Cruz's connections to the Senate Conservatives Fund (SCF), a group known for supporting primary challenges to Republican incumbent senator when he made the comments. SCF never actually endorsed Alexander's primary opponent and Cruz did not endorse in the race.

"But, you know, at the end of the day, if he or anyone else wants to attack their opponents, they can choose to do that," concluded Cruz. "I disagree with that choice. I am going to sing Chris Christie's praises, I'm gonna sing Donald Trump's praises, and I'm going to focus on the issues that matter, which is turning this country around, which is fighting to restore the Constitution, to defend our liberties, to bring back jobs, and growth, and opportunity, and to restore America's leadership in the world. That's what the American people want, not a bunch of self-centered politicians bickering like children in Washington."

Ted Cruz's 2016 campaign says it s raised $14.2M since launch // Bell Jar – July 8, 2015

Republican Sen. Ted Cruz and groups supporting his presidential campaign have raised more than $51 million since launching his bid for the White House three months ago.

The campaign brought in more than $14.2 million from 175,000 contributions with an average donation of $81, according to the statement.

Ben Carson, the only other presidential candidate to unveil his numbers, has said his campaign raised $8.3 million in the second quarter.

Cruz has "one of the strongest war chests among those running for president", the release said, boasting a $51 million fundraising total since March that includes campaign and super PAC fundraising hauls.

Cruz's campaign has until July 15 to file its second-quarter report, which will includes the names of and amounts given by donors.

Cruz, the firebrand first-term senator from Texas, has 4 percent support in an average of polls on realclearpolitcs.com .

"Millions of courageous conservatives here in Georgia, all across the Southeast, all across the country are waking up and saying this doesn't make any sense". But Cruz's campaign made the totals public Sunday, shortly after Cruz shared them in an interview that aired on NBC's "Meet the Press". "We're reassembling the Reagan coalition – from conservatives to libertarians to people of Faith – and with the help of so many supporters, we will be able to deliver our optimistic message all across the country".

Huckabee and Cruz, along with Bobby Jindal and Rick Santorum, have been the most vocal in opposing the Supreme Court's opinion, with Cruz going as far as calling for retention elections of judges.

The Texas senator noted that his father was a legal immigrant from Cuba.

Cruz praised Trump for drawing attention to illegal immigration and said he refuses to commit "Republican-on-Republican violence".

"I've said very clearly that Donald Trump doesn't represent the Republican Party", Perry said on ABC's This Week with George Stephanopoulos.

Ted Cruz's unique spin on the 11th Commandment // CBS News // Steven Benen – July 7, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) has been one of Donald Trump's most vocal defenders in recent weeks, at least among the Republican presidential candidates, but of particular interest is how the Texas senator has made his argument. Consider, for example, what Cruz told NBC's Chuck Todd the other day on "Meet the Press."

"I like Donald Trump. He's bold, he's brash. And I get it that it seems the favorite sport of the Washington media is to encourage some Republicans to attack other Republicans. I'm not going to do it. I'm not interested in Republican-on-Republican violence. [...]
"He has a colorful way of speaking. It is not the way I speak. But I'm not going to engage in the media game of throwing rocks and attacking other Republicans. I'm just not going to do it."

During a Fox News interview yesterday, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R) made clear how unimpressed he was with Cruz's rhetoric. "I find it ironic that Ted Cruz is giving lectures on Republican-on-Republican violence," the governor said. "The guy who put together a group that was sponsoring primary ads against Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-TN) is giving us – the rest of us lectures on Republican on Republican violence. With all due respect, I don't need to be lectured by Ted Cruz."
He added, "Let's just not be hypocritical. Don't lecture as to Donald Trump but then attack Lamar Alexander. All I want is a little consistency."
Christie raises a fair point. The Senate Conservatives Fund, which Cruz has supported, is committed to electing the most far-right candidates possible to the Senate, and in some cases, that's meant backing primary challenges to incumbent GOP senators.
In fact, Christie's comments cast an important light on Cruz's posture. If the Texas Republican simply had a blanket, no-exceptions policy against criticizing all Republicans in all instances – deferring to Reagan's "11th Commandment" – his reluctance to criticize Trump's anti-Mexican rhetoric would at least hold true to some kind of principle.
But Cruz's aversion to "Republican-on-Republican violence" is surprisingly selective.
Cruz, for example, has been willing to criticize Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) on more than one occasion. What's more, literally just last week, we learned that Cruz has written a new book in which he blasts Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and the rest of his own party's leadership on Capitol Hill in a direct and unapologetic way.
What we have, in other words, is a GOP presidential candidate who's more than happy to make use of "Republican-on-Republican violence," so long as it suits his purposes.
And criticizing Donald Trump's racially charged rhetoric does not, evidently, suit Cruz's purposes.
If there's a pattern to Cruz's decision making, it seems to be in the ideological direction – he will criticize Republicans for not being conservative enough, but he won't criticize Republicans for being too conservative. Those he finds to his left deserve his scorn, but he'll refuse to "throw rocks" at those he finds to his right.
* Update: I heard this afternoon from the Senate Conservatives Fund, which took issue with some of Christie's specific claims. The governor said Cruz "put together" the SCF, which isn't true – the group existed before Cruz was elected – though Cruz has offered support to the group.
The Senate Conservatives Fund also disputes Christie's assertion that the group "attacked" Lamar Alexander during his primary. Rather, the SCF claims, it ran ads about Alexander and the Affordable Care Act that the senator probably didn't like, and which happened to coincide with the senator's primary. Good to know.

Top GOP lawyer absolutely scorches Ted Cruz: "Most graduates of Harvard Law School know" better // Salon // Sophia Tesfaye – July 7, 2015

Conservative attorney and prominent gay rights activist Ted Olson took a swipe Republican presidential candidate Ted Cruz , saying the freshman senator had abandoned a fundamental understanding of the constitution when he suggested a constitutional amendment barring same-sex marriage in the wake of the recent Supreme Court decision in favor of marriage equality.

Immediately following the Court's decision, Cruz promised to keep the issue "front and center" in his campaign. "That is very much front and center something I intend to campaign on," he said. "And marriage and religious liberty are going to be integral, I believe, to motivating the American people to come out and vote for what's, ultimately, restoring our constitutional system."

Cruz subsequently proposed altering the Constitution to require Supreme Court justices to face judicial retention elections.

Olson, a former United States Solicitor General under George W. Bush, ridiculed Cruz's plan as politically unachievable: "A constitutional amendment to change Article III of the Constitution in this fashion has virtually no chance of succeeding ... I would think that most graduates of the Harvard Law School know that," he said in an email to the Washington Post.

After arguing against him in Bush v. Gore, Olson famously joined progressive David Boies in Hollingsworth v. Perry, the case affirming the overturning of California's ban on same-sex marriage.

For his part, Cruz, who as Olson points out is a graduate of Harvard Law School, served as a law clerk for Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist from 1996 to 1997 before eventually going on to become solicitor general of Texas.

Despite his Ivy League education, the freshmen senator also revealed a basic lack of understanding of world religions when he recently predicted that the Supreme Court ruling would result in the Justice Department targeting "Jewish churches" that refuse to perform same-sex marriages.

NJ Voters Tepid on Chris Christie's Handling of State Pension System // WSJ // Heather Haddon – July 7, 2015

Nearly half of New Jersey voters have an unfavorable view of one of Gov. Chris Christie's signature policy achievements, the overhaul of the state's underfunded pension system, a new poll shows.

The survey by the Monmouth University Polling Institute found 47% of the 503 New Jersey residents polled didn't believe the governor had made a meaningful fix to the pension system. Of those polled, 11% viewed his handling of the issue as a major success and 31% found it minor.

The poll, conducted June 30 and July 1 and released Tuesday, also found growing support for the Affordable Care Act, one of President Barack Obama's biggest policy initiatives. Forty-nine percent had a favorable opinion of the health-insurance law, the highest level in nearly two years. Support split along party lines.

"The past couple of weeks have been good for the president, and that is reflected both in his job approval rating and an uptick in support for his signature health-care policy," said Patrick Murray, the institute's director.

Majority of N.J. Voters Think Chris Christie Should Step Down: Pol l (July 2, 2015)
The survey is one of the first to gauge public opinion on pensions since the New Jersey Supreme Court ruled in June that Mr. Christie's moves to trim contributions to the retirement system for state workers were legally valid.

Forty-two percent of those polled disapproved of Mr. Christie's decision to scale back on a scheduled payment into the system, while 12% approved. Nearly half had no opinion.

Mr. Christie has spoken about his administration's 2011 pension overhaul in political events leading up to his declaration last week that he is running for president. He began cutting scheduled payments into the pension system due to a budget shortfall last year.

When asked, Mr. Christie has said he would put more money into the pension system if New Jersey could afford to do so. The Republican has refused to raise taxes in the state, arguing that would stymie job creation.

The governor has called for unions to return to the bargaining table to negotiate additional cuts to make the pension system sustainable. Talks have progressed little, people involved in the negotiations said.

The administration did score a victory on Monday in a vote by a state health panel that will enable savings on health benefits to workers. The state expects about $100 million in savings.

The survey also weighed opinions on New Jersey's state senators. Thirty-seven percent of those surveyed said they approved of the work of U.S. Sen. Bob Menendez and 36% disapproved, a dip from earlier surveys before the Democrat was indicted on corruption charges in April. He has pleaded not guilty.

Meanwhile, 44% approved of fellow Democrat U.S. Sen. Cory Booker's work, while 22% disapproved, down from a 51% approval rating in a May survey.

The telephone poll of registered voters had a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4 percentage points.

New Jersey Democrats troll Chris Christie // Politico // Daniel Strauss – July 7, 2015

New Jersey Democrats are planning to throw a monkey wrench into New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie's plans to run for president.

A pair of Democratic lawmakers, state Sens. Raymond Lesniak and Loretta Weinberg, are likely to cosponsor legislation that would require Christie and future New Jersey governors to resign from office if they want to run for president, according to NJ.com.

"He's not doing the state any good by spending the bulk of his time out of state," Lesniak said. "And even when he's in-state, he's focusing on what he has to do to get elected president — which often runs contrary to what he ought to do for the state."

The plan comes in the wake of a Monmouth University poll released a week ago that said that 76 percent of New Jersey voters think Christie is more focused on his political future than he is on New Jersey. The poll also found that 57 percent want him to resign since he's decided to run for president.

Still, the proposal isn't likely to become law. It would need to be signed by Christie or have the support of enough Republicans in the Legislature to join with Democrats in overriding a veto by the governor. Lesniak acknowledged that a major step is getting Republicans on board.

"We could do this in July," Lesniak said. "But the bigger problem is getting the handful of GOP senators that we'd probably need to override him, although I think it would send a good statement regardless. And who knows? Maybe some Republicans would vote for it."

If Christie were to resign, Lt. Gov. Kim Guadagno would replace him and there would be a special election in 2016.

Christie's office brushed off the Democrats' move.

"It's impossible to respond to every bit of silly nonsense that comes from this legislature," Christie spokesman Brian Murray said in a statement to POLITICO. "The Governor has been clear that he is never disconnected from doing his job as governor."

N.J. Dems Prod a Defiant Chris Christie to Resign // NBC News // Kelly O'Donnell – July 7, 2015

New Jersey Democrats are mounting a plan to push Chris Christie out of the governor's office, but Christie aides say it has "zero chance" of being successful.

Advisers to the 2016 presidential candidate say that the governor will keep on doing "hands on" work with the state government even as his political foes mull legislation that would require any New Jersey governor seeking the presidency - including Christie - to resign.

If that legislation passed, Christie would veto it. A veto override would require that enough Republicans in the legislature join with Democrats, something that has never happened during Christie's tenure.

"It's impossible to respond to every bit of silly nonsense that comes from this legislature," Christie deputy press secretary Brian Murray said in a statement. "The Governor has been clear that he is never disconnected from doing his job as governor."

Christie's team also pointed on Tuesday to his work with Democrats in the state House to provide a tax break for working families, suggesting that the success of his earned income tax credit proposal shows that he's remained engaged with his home state -- and with the same Democrats prodding him to resign -- despite his frequent out-of-state travel.

Asked by NBC's Matt Lauer last week if he would consider resigning his office during his run for president, Christie replied "I can't imagine I would, no."

Christie is struggling with poor approval ratings at home. A Monmouth University poll last week showed a majority - 57 percent - of New Jersey voters say that he should resign now that he's made his White House bid official.

Webb: The real deal about Chris Christie // The Hill // David Webb – July 7, 2015

He's announced. I'm telling it like it is.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie officially made his bid for the GOP nomination — and eventually the White House — in his hometown of Livingston, N.J., and then he went straight to New Hampshire.

The instant pundit debate over whether Christie can win primaries and win over the Republican base is interesting, but no different from the debate over other GOP candidates. They all have their challenges, their pros and cons.

The town hall format is a strength, and that matters to Christie's campaign in a state like New Hampshire, where retail politics and grassroots engagement — or lack of it — can make or break a candidate. Christie had crisscrossed the state prior to his announcement and will likely spend half of his time or more initially there. New Hampshire, unlike many of the Southern states, has a broader representation of the general electorate across the country.

The debate over the spouse of a candidate aside, clearly his wife, Mary Pat, is an asset on the campaign trail as well. She is intelligent, warm and approachable. To some extent she puts a softer side on display for the often-brash Christie.

But the governor has a New Jersey problem. There will be a attacks based on the state's credit downgrades, and issues over the Second Amendment, even about immigration in the growth of the illegal alien population. Christie will have to mount a vigorous defense and explanation based on being a Republican governor in a Democrat-controlled state. The bad legacy left by former governors Jim McGreevey and Jon Corzine will only matter to the voters who know this legacy. The more conservative base of the Republican Party has questioned before and will continue to question the governor's conservative credentials.

I won't discount a win or top-three placement in the primary for Christie in South Carolina, however. Sen. Lindsey Graham is not really a factor even in his own home state, and straight-talking politicians have appeal in the Palmetto State. By the time the primary arrives, if Christie is in the top five, he will make a serious effort to win South Carolina.

Iowa has a staunch Republican base, which will be tough for Christie to win over, and Iowa is not as red as it's often portrayed, especially in the general election. The big-money donors and political action committees know this. A decent placement in third, or at least in the top five, in the Iowa primary would keep the New Jersey governor in contention.

The money matters. Money not only allows for media campaigns and travel — it also grants the ability to put teams in place in key primary states. After all, politics, once the shouting has subsided and the differences are highlighted, is about the ability to mount a consistent and effective ground game. It's not a question of whether someone like businessman Ken Langone can bundle money for Christie. He is a well-known fundraiser with a significant network. Christie has raised a lot of money, the most of any head of the Republican Governors Association. That gives him access to monetary and political capital. Count on him calling in these favors.

Who has to attack Christie? First, those who need to draw a stark contrast. The more socially conservative candidates will do this. They will attack on the basis of Christie being a Northern, moderate Republican. The pushback from Christie will be that he is a pro-life Catholic. So this may be a wash.

The second group includes the candidates whose position he threatens. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.) and Donald Trump will have to contend for some of the same voting block: moderate Republican and independent voters. One of the defenses Christie will have against this will be the fact that he worked with a Democrat-controlled legislature that has a union man as president of the state Senate. Constitutional conservatives like myself understand that a governor has to sign what he or she cannot veto.

The dread and often dead winter months will be hard for every candidate. Political fatigue will set in for even the hard-core base and many Americans will turn instead to Thanksgiving, Christmas and the new year ahead. Politicians may want to hibernate and prepare for the 2016 relaunch.

Super Tuesday is a long way away, but if Christie survives the winter political doldrums, it will become a much more exciting day. It's a political pundits dream, and for journalists a feeding frenzy.

The cynic in me still believes that presidential elections should begin on Jan. 1 of the election year. But then again, like politicians, I am allowed to dream.

Chris Christie Administration Whistleblower To Justice Department: Bridgegate Prosecutor May Be Compromised // IB Times // David Sirota & Andrew Perez – July 7, 2015

When Chris Christie's administration quashed a grand jury's 43 indictments against the Republican governor's supporters in 2010, local prosecutor Bennett Barlyn objected. He was soon fired. Barlyn says the move to throw out the Hunterdon County indictments may have violated federal law -- and that ties between New Jersey U.S. Attorney Paul Fishman's office and Gov. Christie may have improperly prevented a probe from moving forward.

Barlyn sent a letter to Attorney General Loretta Lynch on Monday, expressing concern that "apparent conflicts between Governor Christie's administration and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of New Jersey ... may be compromising the latter's independent role relating to the enforcement of federal criminal law."

In February, International Business Times reported that investigators from Fishman's office interviewed Barlyn about the events surrounding the quashed grand jury indictments. ABC News confirmed the IBTimes report. But Fishman's office abruptly issued a statement appearing to clear Christie and declaring that no investigation was underway. Former U.S. attorneys interviewed by IBTimes said such a statement pre-emptively exonerating a public official is extremely unusual.

Barlyn says in the letter to Lynch that this public backtracking "immediately confirmed my suspicion that the interview was not conducted as part of a genuine inquiry, but was instead intended to placate me and forestall my efforts" to have the quashed indictments investigated.

The Justice Department and Fishman's office declined to answer IBTimes' questions about Barlyn's letter. Christie's office did not respond to IBTimes' requests for comment.

Barlyn first contacted Fishman's office last year with allegations -- made in the past by other former employees in the Hunterdon County prosecutor's office -- that the Christie administration had illegally thrown out grand jury indictments against supporters, including the local county Sheriff Deborah Trout and Undersheriff Mike Russo. Barlyn has maintained he was fired after raising objections and has filed a wrongful termination lawsuit.

Barlyn's case was assigned to investigator Thomas Mahoney, who was hired by Christie in 2006 when Christie was New Jersey's U.S. attorney.

Despite his ties to Christie, Mahoney was permitted to not only be the point person on Barlyn's case but also be a "supervisory criminal investigator" on the probe of lane closures at the George Washington Bridge by officials at the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey. The "Bridgegate" investigation generated a guilty plea and two indictments of former top Christie allies, but the governor was not implicated.

During a Bridgegate press conference in May, Fishman was asked if his office faced any challenges in remaining independent. "There's nobody who was working on this case in my office -- no lawyers working on this case in my office -- who was hired by Gov. Christie," Fishman said.

A representative for Fishman later clarified that Mahoney had worked on the case but said that "he is not a lawyer."

In fact, according to records obtained by IBTimes, roughly 40 percent of the current U.S. attorney's office is made up of personnel hired by Christie.

Barlyn's letter to Lynch is the latest incident to raise questions about Fishman's independence from the governor.

In diaries released in early 2014, Hoboken's Democratic mayor Dawn Zimmer said she feared bringing allegations of Christie administration misdeeds to Fishman because "Christie has friends throughout [the U.S.] attorney's office."

In June, Fishman's office requested that a federal court bar the public release of 1.5 million pages of documents obtained from the Christie administration in the Bridgegate investigation.

Lawyers for one defendant in the case, former Port Authority official Bill Baroni, said Fishman's move to conceal the documents was designed to prevent the release of information they say could absolve their client and potentially incriminate others in the Christie administration.

The attempt to bar disclosure of evidence, Baroni's lawyers said, in part illustrates that "something is afoot besides a paternalistic desire to protect members of the governor's inner circle, alumni of this U.S. attorney's office, high-ranking Port Authority employees and others."

Governor Chris Christie: Media Should Apologize to Me for Bridgegate // Newsbusters // Randy hall – July 7, 2015

During a Monday morning appearance on the MSNBC's Morning Joe program, New Jersey governor Chris Christie was asked by panelist Katty Kay about his role in the possible "creation of a culture" in his administration that led to the Bridgegate lane closure incident, which took place in early September of 2013.

The 2016 GOP presidential candidate responded to the obnoxious question by instead calling the incident "an exception, not the rule," and stating that people in the media should have stood up and said: "We're sorry, governor, for having jumped to conclusions;" and "not only have accused you, but convicted you."

The segment began with Kay asking Christie a question she undoubtedly wouldn't put to Democratic presidential front-runner and scandal-plagued Hillary Clinton:

If you were running against yourself, wouldn't you say: "This is somebody who surrounds himself with people to whom the subliminal message is: 'We will do whatever it takes to make sure that we are in the right position politically, even if that means shutting down bridges?'

"I don't necessarily want to know about it. I'm not going to talk about it, but that you allowed a culture in your office that would allow that kind of thing to happen?"

Christie replied: "That's where the people who accuse you of doing something wrong, when they're disappointed and find out that you didn't, that's their refuge.

"Remember in the beginning," he continued, "it was: 'He did this. He directed it. He's this kind of guy.' Then all of a sudden, you're not. Then they say: 'OK, now what do we do?'

"So instead of just standing up and saying what they should say, which is 'We're sorry, governor, for having jumped to conclusions; we're sorry for having prejudged this; we're sorry for having not only accused you, but convicted you,' they say: 'Oh, well, all right; now it's a culture.'"

It wasn't a culture because if it was, Katty, there would have been a lot of these incidents. There wouldn't have been 100 Democrats, elected Democrats, supporting me for re-election.

I wouldn't have gotten over a third of the Republican vote and 51 percent of the Hispanic vote if this was a pattern. It's not.

"Exceptions happen; accidents, mistakes happen," he stated. "You still have to be accountable for them, but it does not mean there was a culture because if there was, there would be more than just one person in the governor's office. That's called an exception, not the rule."

The problems began on Monday, Sept. 9, 2013, when two of three eastbound toll lanes on the George Washington Bridge were closed to morning rush hour traffic, which was forced to use crowded state and interstate expressways until the road was re-opened the following Friday.

As NewsBusters previously reported, NBC's evening newscast devoted four minutes and 55 seconds to the "scandal" when it broke on January 8.

According to Scott Whitlock, a senior news analyst for the Media Research Center (the parent company of the NewsBusters website):

In less than 48 hours, ABC, CBS and NBC deluged viewers with coverage of Chris Christie's traffic jam scandal, devoting a staggering 88 minutes to the story.

In comparison, these same news outlets over the last six months have allowed a scant two minutes for the latest on Barack Obama's Internal Revenue Service scandal. The disparity in less than two days is 44 to one.

"From Wednesday through Friday morning, the latest on Christie's Traffic-Gate led 11 out of 13 news programs," Whitlock noted. "NBC produced the heaviest coverage, over 34 minutes. CBS followed close behind with more than 30 minutes. ABC came in third with just under 23 minutes."

However, when the Republican governor was cleared of any wrongdoing in the matter, "ABC and CBS punted on the story and didn't cover it in their Thursday night newscasts," MRC news analyst Curtis Houck reported.

"NBC Nightly News did cover the story, however, but only in the form of a news brief that lasted for 38 seconds," he added, in which then-anchor Brian Williams stated:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A major headline this evening in the federal investigation into New Jersey governor Chris Christie and his administration.

Federal officials tell NBC News that, after nine months, investigators have concluded there is no evidence that governor Christie had advance knowledge of any politically motivated scheme to shut down lanes on the George Washington Bridge, which is the world's busiest span.

It wouldn't be wise for Christie to hold his breath while waiting for an apology from the people who used the incident to attack his popularity or hoping the press would pose a similar question to Hillary Clinton. There isn't a shade of purple deep enough to match the color of his face if he tried.

Why Chris Christie may have an edge in GOP race // CNBC // Mark Macias – July 7, 2015

Donald Trump just might be the second best thing that happened to New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie.

Christie recently announced he's running for president in 2016. Much of America might not know it yet, but if you live in New York or New Jersey and watch the local news, you know that Christie has an explosive temperament. You either love his brutal honesty or hate his bullying nature, but regardless of where you sit on the political couch, Christie's mouth can make any ear blush.

For the past 6 years, Christie has owned the local political show as the only governor in the Tri-State area to speak his mind without reverence for diplomacy or political correctness. He called a Navy Seal an "idiot" when he challenged the governor publicly. When a teacher asked him why he said their schools and teachers were failing, Christie responded: "Because they are... I am tired of you people." And when another teacher questioned why she wasn't paid fairly, Christie was brutally honest: "Well you know what? Then you don't have to do it."

But now, there is a new controversial presidential candidate who is already overshadowing Christie. With Trump in the race, Christie suddenly seems more palatable.

Even the "Bridgegate" scandal, which accused Christie's administration of closing the George Washington Bridge in retaliation to a local mayor, seems like a school yard tussle compared to Trump and his fight with Macy's, Univision, NBC, Mexico, China, etc.

But will that palatable perception last? Or better yet, will voters in Iowa buy it?

If I were consulting Christie, I would say, as long as he can bite his tongue and control his temper between now and New Hampshire, he just might have the political chops and finesse to charm his way with voters. Christie knows that deep, down inside, he can't be constantly combative if he's going to convince voters he should be in control of the nuclear button. He's also smart enough to know he has to be good and liked if he is going to win the nomination.

Christie is off to a great start by surrounding himself with smart strategists who understand how the media works. Immediately after his presidential announcement, Christie did an interview with NBC's Matt Lauer, where he repositioned his temper as passion.

"I'm angry about the fact that taxpayers were being ripped off in New Jersey," Christie told Lauer. "I'm angry about the fact that our urban kids can't get a good education. I'm angry about those things — you're darn right I am. And I think America wants someone who's willing to fight for that."

Brilliant PR move: The sooner you address your point of weakness, the less persuasive your opponents sound. The person who tells the story first is in better control of the narrative. Christie didn't avoid the tough accusations like other presidential candidates have done. Instead, he addressed it straight on and unabashedly.

Now, whether conservative voters buy into Christie's more moderate positions is another issue. He faces the same challenge that Rudy Giuliani had when he ran for president in 2008: He's a moderate on social issues that are crucial to the conservative base.

So, if Trump is the second-best thing to happen to Christie, what's the first? All of the other 13 GOP contenders combined.

Publicity is difficult in any crowded field because it's harder to stand out from the pack. When smart phones first hit the market, it was easy to get publicity for mobile apps because they were rare. Today, the market for mobile apps is saturated, making it more difficult to get your story told. It's the same for the GOP candidates. Fiorina, Carson, Graham, Pataki, Paul, Perry — for the typical voter, those names run together like a Jindal, I mean jingle. This is where Christie will shine.

He understands, like Trump, how to move the media needle. He has governed a big state, like Jeb Bush and Rick Perry. He has big donors behind him, like Marco Rubio. But unlike those other candidates — Trump, Bush, Perry and Rubio - Christie doesn't have their baggage. No one will question Christie's bravado and experience against Rubio. Christie seems less volatile than Trump, who seems to threaten a new company every day on the campaign trail. Sure, Perry was the longest-running governor of Texas and Bush was governor of a swing state, but Christie was elected governor twice in a blue state.

But much of the minutiae will be lost in the crowded presidential debates. When you have 10 candidates on one stage trying to explain a position in under 90 seconds, the only thing voters will remember is how the candidates came across. And who can forget how Christie comes across.

As long as Christie can be direct and respectful, he just might have a winning edge to the nomination, assuming he can win over the conservative base.

GRAHAM

Lindsey Graham Protests 'Brad Pitt' Debate // Bloomberg // Ben Brody – July 7, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Lindsey Graham is launching a protest of the "Brad Pitt" debate.

In an e-mail Tuesday, the South Carolina senator urged supporters to sign a petition protesting the terms of an Aug. 6 debate, the first scheduled faceoff among the Republican presidential contenders. Fox News, the debate sponsor, has said it will allow 10 candidates, based on their standing in the polls.

Graham, at distinct risk of being left out, suggesting Brad Pitt, the A-list star of movies like Fight Club and The Curious Case of Benjamin Button, "would have a better shot of being on the debate stage than real candidates for president" because the current "criterion favors celebrities and candidates who have run previously with high name recognition."

Another celebrity-turned-presidential candidate, real estate mogul and reality TV star Donald Trump, has polling numbers that give him a virtual lock on an onstage seat.

Fox News has said it will rely on candidates' standing in national polls to decide who will head to the stage but hasn't yet specific which polls it will use.

Graham receives support from about one percent of registered Republicans in swing states, according to a recent poll from Quinnipiac University, meaning he'd be unlikely to make the cutoff for the first Republican primary debate.

"Republican primary voters deserve to hear from all the candidates, not just the ones network executives pick to be on stage," Graham wrote in his email.

Fox News has said it will rely on candidates' standing in national polls to decide who will head to the stage but hasn't yet specific which polls it will use.

Lindsey Graham On Trump: GOP "Must Speak Up," He's "Not Part Of The Party I Want To Have" // Buzzfeed // Andrew Jaczynski – July 7, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Lindsey Graham said it's important for members of his party to "speak up" in opposition to Donald Trump's controversial remarks on immigrants, adding that Trump's comments are not part of "the party I want to have."
"I'm not embarrassed I just think that everybody's got to speak up," the senator from South Carolina said on Boston Herald Radio.

"At the end of the day this is not the party I want to have. You have people in the party who say things sometimes that are against what I think the party stands for, so it's incumbent upon the rest to say, 'hey no, that's not the Republican Party that I want.'"
At his presidential campaign announcement event, Trump described the immigrants that come to the United States from Mexico as "rapists."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"They're sending people that have lots of problems, and they're bringing those problems with us," Trump said. "They're bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists."
Graham added in the interview that he thought Trump was a "very successful man" and that the Republican Party "would get through" Trump.

He also said he believes the Republican Party had a lot to offer the African-American and Hispanic community.

"The Hispanic community, I think Republicans can do well in 2016. African-American and Hispanic families have not done very well in terms of Obama economics. What do we offer, it's got to be about what we offer and I think the middle class is never gonna get better in this country until you have a growing economy where people compete for labor."

Graham said the way some Republicans speak about immigration has hurt his party.
"The immigration issue has hurt us," said Graham. "I've said this for a long time. The way the Republican Party — some elements — have dealt with immigration, the way we've talk about immigrants, has hurt us. I just believe we've gone from 44% to 27% among Hispanics because of rhetoric like this."

Graham Questions Obama's Commitment to Removing Assad From Power // Free Beacon // Blake Seitz – July 7, 2015

On Tuesday, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) pressed Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter to admit that the Obama administration is not committed to deposing Syrian dictator Bashar al-Assad.

"As to Assad, what's more likely?" Graham mused. "President Obama leaves office in 2017, or Assad goes first?"

"Uh, well, it's certain that President Obama will leave then, so that's an easy question," Carter said. "It ends up turning on whether Assad will be in power then."

"Yes, well I know that," Graham chuckled.

The senator repeated his question: "Who leaves first, Obama or Assad?"

"Well, I certainly hope it's Assad," Carter answered.

"Yeah I do, but I don't think so," Graham said.

The exchange occurred during Tuesday's hearing on U.S. involvement in the Middle East before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Obama administration officials insisted as early as 2011 that Assad must go, but have since done very little to effect a change of power in Damascus, even after the Syrian regime murdered thousands of its citizens with weapons of mass destruction in 2013.

President Obama repeated Monday that the Syrian civil war would only end if there is "a new government without Bashar Assad," but so far he has forbidden the U.S. military from targeting Syrian government forces in airstrikes as part of Operation Inherent Resolve.

Carter told Graham that the United States is committed to finding "a political exit for Assad."

The Syrian Civil War has killed more than 310,000 people in four years, according to the Syrian Observatory of Human Rights.

Lindsey Graham campaign joins Fiorina in attacking Clinton's CNN Interview: Clinton has 'selective hearing and memory' // Breitbart // Alex Swoyer – July 7, 2015

GOP presidential candidate Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-SC) campaign joined fellow GOP candidate Carly Fiorina in response to Hillary Clinton's long awaited formal sit down interview, which the Democratic frontrunner gave to CNN.

This was the first national broadcast interview Clinton has given since formally announcing her campaign.

Christian Ferry, Graham's campaign manager, told Breitbart News, "Hillary Clinton clearly has selective hearing and memory."

Ferry continued, "She doesn't seem to recall that Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-SC)47% has been fighting to secure our border and fix our broken immigration system for the last decade. This is no surprise considering that she still believes the national security policy she helped implement with Barack Obama has made the world and our country safer."

Ferry's statement mirrors the criticism Fiorina made when she posted on Facebook that CNN didn't question Clinton on her track record as Secretary of State.

HUCKABEE

Huckabee blasts Obama, 'Still in denial about the threats we face' // Breitbart // Alex Swoyer – July 7, 2015

GOP presidential candidate Gov. Mike Huckabee says President Obama is in denial about ISIS following his statements on the terrorist organization.

"President Obama is still in denial about the threat we face from ISIS. The President admitted that ISIS is filling a 'void' in the region, but failed to mention why the void exists in the first place: The Obama Administration refused to leave a residual force in Iraq and then dismissed ISIS as a 'jayvee team,'" Huckabee stated.

The presidential candidate added Obama continues to call the terrorists "violent extremists" and not identify them by their ideology – radical Islam.

"This is about as intellectually dishonest as it gets from Washington. Jihadists are slaughtering civilians by the tens of thousands and would kill millions if they could," Huckabee added.

He concluded:

There was nothing new in President Obama's glorified photo-op at the Pentagon. The Obama Administration promised to train 5,400 moderate rebels per year to fight ISIS. Yet less than 100 are being trained. What will it take for President Obama to abandon his weak, incremental escalation in the Middle East and finally take the fight to ISIS?

CARSON

Ben Carson's godly riches // Politico // Tarini Parti – July 7, 2015

Before Ben Carson was vying for votes from members of Christian organizations, he was charging them tens of thousands of dollars — in some cases even more than he charged groups with no religious ties — for speeches.

Carson, now a GOP presidential candidate, brought in nearly $2 million delivering inspirational speeches to faith-based groups like Christian high schools and pregnancy centers in 2014. Of his five most expensive speeches, four of them were for Christian entities, a POLITICO analysis of his financial disclosure form shows.

Billed by the Washington Speaker's Bureau as an "inspiring storyteller" who is "soft-spoken yet charismatic" and capable of "commanding the stage," Carson's speaking fees varied widely, from $12,320 to $48,500.

Last August, Hope Pregnancy Center in College Station, Texas, was one of the organizations that doled out $40,500 — close to Carson's highest speaking fee — for the neurosurgeon-turned-author to speak at a fundraiser and attend a private, 45-minute reception with donors beforehand. The faith-based, pro-life organization works with women with unplanned pregnancies.

"We called the speaker's bureau and we were told that number," explained Tracy Frank, executive director of the center. "Washington Speakers Bureau dictated the terms … We're not that sophisticated and stuff. I'm going to cry if you're telling me he did others for a lot less."

Carson gave 115 speeches for lower amounts in 2014 alone.

Frank said she didn't negotiate with the Washington Speakers Bureau because of Carson's popularity. The fundraiser brought in a net profit of $150,000. Frank — along with other organizers of several other events — said Carson was paid more than past speakers, but they were able to make a significant net profit because they drew a bigger audience or were able to charge more for tickets.

"It was probably higher than we've paid before," she continued, "but then again, we wanted Phil Robertson from 'Duck Dynasty,' and he was far more expensive."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ron Wade, executive director of HopeWorks Inc. – a Tennessee-based Christian group that seeks to help the poor and homeless and paid Carson $24,500 for a fundraiser last year — said he didn't know if he was being charged more or less than other organizations. But he said he was willing to pay the speaking fees without much negotiation because it's hard to find appropriate speakers who can draw a crowd.

"It is so difficult to be popular and also meet the mission," Wade said. "We just go with what we can get. He did a really good job for us in bringing in people who may not have known about HopeWorks. It would be great if he and other speakers would say, 'HopeWorks is great, and we'll do it for free.' But most people don't say that."

Overall, Carson reported earning $4 million in speaking fees in 2014. In addition to the fees, he earned between $1 million and $6 million in book royalties in the same year, his disclosures show.

The Washington's Speaker's Bureau did not respond to requests for comment on how the fees were determined. The bureau has taken down Carson's bio — which said, "Ben Carson's remarkable journey from tough, inner-city youth to history-making neurosurgeon celebrates and illustrates the power we all have to excel and influence others" — now that Carson is on the campaign trail.

Carson's campaign also declined to comment, saying that it had included everything that was legally required in the financial disclosures.

Carson has written six best-selling books, including "America the Beautiful: Rediscovering What Made This Nation Great"; "One Nation: What We Can All Do to Save America's Future"; and "One Vote: Make Your Voice Heard." In speeches, he often draws from his books along with the TNT movie "Gifted Hands: The Ben Carson Story," which chronicles his life and stars Oscar winner Cuba Gooding Jr.

Carson's popularity among Christian crowds is part of how a doctor with no political experience has been able to gain more traction in Iowa than many better-credentialed contenders, such as former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, who are vying for the same evangelical supporters.

Although there was already a movement underway to draft Carson to run for president, nonprofit leaders who hired him for speeches last year said he wasn't overtly political and focused more on his life story and the "moral climate" of the country.

"It was a call for our people to pray more and seek God's guidance for leadership for our country," said Gary Moore, senior associate pastor for the Second Baptist Church, of Carson's speech at the Houston church's "If My People" conference.

But occasionally, based on some video clips and media reports of the speeches, Carson commented on how conservatives have been silenced for their views on social issues. "I think political correctness is one of the worst things that we ever brought to America," he said in a speech for the Family Foundation of Virginia. "And here we are allowing it to be reintroduced through the back door as a good thing. It's not a good thing. It's an evil thing."

"If you believe in traditional marriage, then you're a homophobe," he said in the same speech, for which he was paid $32,000. "If you believe in life, then you're anti-woman. If you're white and you oppose a progressive black person, you're a racist. If you're black and you oppose a progressive agenda, you're crazy."

During another speech at the University of Cumberlands last April, Carson more directly discussed his potential White House bid, according to a video: "I do realize that our country is in a lot of trouble. One of the biggest challenges that our country faces is our national debt, which is $17.5 trillion. Most people cannot comprehend this amount. Hopefully someone will come along who really catches fire and really understands the Constitution and understands freedom … If that doesn't happen, I would have to give serious consideration to it."

But more than expressing his views on social and political issues, the paid speeches were a chance for Carson to share his life story with large audiences ahead of his announcement, and pick up supporters who could easily connect to it, like HopeWorks' Wade, who brought Carson to Cordova, Tennessee, for an event titled, "A Morning of Hope with Ben Carson." The event cost $60 per ticket.

"He's so authentic," Wade said. "He impressed me. If he is still in the Republican primary when Tennessee votes, I would vote for him."

A Movie Was Once Made About Ben Carson (And It May Be Helping Him) // The Daily Caller // Alex Pappas – July 8, 2015

"There's too much God in it," Ben Carson remembers someone telling him.

Filming had already started on the TNT movie about his life, "Gifted Hands: The Ben Carson Story," when one of the major sponsors suggested toning down some parts about his Christian faith. There were concerns about alienating a general audience.

“I just said, ‘No problem, you can take it out,’” Carson recalled in a recent interview with The Daily Caller. “‘But take me out too, because it won’t be about me.’”

“And then they backed off.”

Based on his 1996 autobiography with the same title, the uplifting TV movie tells the story of Carson’s path from inner-city Detroit to the Johns Hopkins operating table, where he first successfully separated twins conjoined at the head.

The 2009 movie has helped make Carson, now running as an outsider for the Republican nomination for president, famous: it has played in schools, churches and on the Black Entertainment Television network (BET). Hundreds of thousands of DVDs have been sold. It streams on Netflix.

It could also help explain in part why Carson, who has never run for office, is polling in second-place in evangelical-heavy Iowa and in third place nationally, according to the Real Clear Politics polling average.

Before the movie deal was inked, Carson said he talked with as many as 15 different production companies. He wanted to make sure the film stayed true to life and didn’t take artistic liberties.

Carson was finally satisfied: “TNT and Sony said they would do it accurately, and that they would consult with me in the process.”

“It turned out to be a two-edged sword, because they were always calling me,” Carson said with a laugh.

In an interview with TheDC, Dan Angel, the executive producer of Gifted Hands, said he made a promise to Carson. “I am going to tell your story from beginning to end and tell the truth. I’m not going to add anything.”

Carson was active during production: Angel said he visited the set in Detroit, spending time with actor Cuba Gooding Jr., who played him.

“He would be there every step of the way whenever we needed to talk to him about reality checks,” Angel said of Carson. “We would have Cuba Gooding Jr. on the phone with him. And he gave complete access to his life, which is really important.”

Gooding, through agent Adam Schweitzer, declined to be interviewed.

But in a 2009 appearance on CBS, the actor praised Carson. “I always say about men like this: they’re like God’s tool,” Gooding said. “He’s really given him a gift and he’s touched so many people.”

Carson says he was satisfied with the finished product. “I thought they did a spectacular job. Cuba came and spent a couple days with me. He got a chance to sort of see how I talk and how I act.”

“I mean the idea that this amazing mom growing up in Detroit could raise two boys in the worst of conditions of poverty — you can imagine what the conditions were in the poorest town in America — and you would have any shot at coming out successful,” said Angel, the executive producer. “It’s the ultimate beating the odds story.”

Carson said his mother, Sonya Carson, also spoke with the filmmakers. “She had a number of conversations on the phone with Kimberly Elise, who plays her,” he said.

His mother remains in his life today, but her health has been declining.

Hours before Carson announced his entry into the presidential race this summer, he got a call that his mom, who has Alzheimer’s, was no longer eating or drinking.

“They basically just said, ‘this is the end,’” a soft-spoken Carson said. “Take her home. And let her die there. That’s news I got the day before the announcement.”

In what Carson thought might be their final goodbye, his family rushed to her bedside. His wife, Candy, played the violin while his kids were singing and reading verses from the Bible. Carson said supporters told him they were praying for her.

And to everyone’s surprise, she got better.

“She just all of a sudden bloomed,” he said. “She blossomed. And she was back, and she was better than she was before.”

As for the film, Carson said his mother was satisfied with how it turned out, even as it showed difficult times for her, including her bouts with depression.

“I’ll tell you, it takes a lot to make her happy,” Carson said with a laugh. “It says a lot for Kimberly.”

The film won a $100,000 Epiphany Prize for “most inspiring movie of 2009,” but not all the reviews were pretty.

[en Carson signs ‘no new tax’ pledge, visits New Hampshire] // The Washington Times // Seth McLaughlin – July 7, 2015

Vowing to crack down on the free-spending ways of Washington, Ben Carson signed a “no new tax” pledge here Tuesday as part a two-day swing through the first-in-the-nation primary state of New Hampshire.

Buoyed by solid fundraising and strong poll numbers, Mr. Carson is working to broaden his appeal beyond the grassroots activists that helped to compel the retired neurosurgeon to run for the 2016 GOP presidential nomination.

“The tax pledge is the least I can do,” Mr. Carson told The Washington Times. “I would go much further than saying I am not going to raise taxes. I think we need to reform the system completely — make it truly fair, with liberty and justice for everybody.”

Mr. Carson called for a “proportional tax” of somewhere between 10 percent and 15 percent on individual and corporate income, and for the elimination of all tax deductions, including the cherished mortgage-interest and charity-donation deductions.

The 63-year-old also came out against “sanctuary cities” that refuse to cooperate with federal deportation efforts on immigration, following the slaying of a San Francisco woman, with which an illegal immigrant who had been deported five times has been charged.

Voters in the early primary states are being pulled in various directions because of the sheer size of the GOP field.

That was a clear reminder of that Tuesday after Mr. Carson and former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina crossed paths on the streets of downtown Portsmouth. Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana also traveled through the state on Tuesday.

Polls show Mr. Carson, who has never held political office, is running third nationally behind former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin. He is tied for second in Iowa, which kicks off the nomination race, and is running in the middle of the pack in New Hampshire.

The Carson campaign announced earlier this month that it had pulled in $8.3 million in its opening quarter and more than $10 million since he launched his exploratory committee in early March.

“We have easily what we need to run our campaign,” Mr. Carson said. “The pundits early on said it would be impossible for us to mount a national campaign since we weren’t connected to the big money and we are doing just fine because they forgot about one very important thing — the people.”

Mr. Carson and his wife, Candy, celebrated his 40th wedding anniversary in nearby Nashua on Monday and followed that up Tuesday with five separate stops across the state.

Mr. Carson cast himself as an Washington outsider and drove home the idea that he is taking the same fact-based approach to policy as he did in the operating room, where he became renowned for separating conjoined twins.

“There are a lot of people who have been in Washington for decades,” he said “I don’t think you would really want them to tie your shoe.”

Mr. Carson said he opposed Obamacare, and said that he would push for health savings accounts, as well as the ability for people to purchase insurance across state lines.

Asked about Social Security, he advocated for gradually raising the retirement age over time and said that he would offer a tax credit in exchange for people choosing to opt out of the program.

On immigration, he said he would seal the border and provide guest-worker permits to illegal immigrants, as long as the paid back taxes.

He said Congress should pass laws protecting religious freedom in the wake of the Supreme Court’s ruling in favor of same-sex marriage.

Ginny Hooker, 60, of Pittsfield, said she is open to voting for Mr. Carson.

“I would consider. It is still too early, but I think he will do well,” Ms. Hooker said, adding that she likes how he comes across as a genuine person. “People can relate to him. He feels like he is someone who is easy to approach.”

Barry Heller, 66, of Merrimack, said Mr. Carson has good ideas, but comes off flat on the stump.

“His biggest shortcoming is he is not as dynamic a speaker as a lot of the others,” Mr. Heller said. “He needs to be a better speaker to get the message across.”

Ben Carson Has Sold More Copies Of His Book Than Every Other 2016 Republican Combined — By A Lot // Buzzfeed // McKay Coppins – July 7, 2015

The Iowa caucuses are still months away, but one presidential hopeful has already pulled far ahead in the 2016 conservative book sales primary: Dr. Ben Carson.
Carson’s book, One Nation: What We Can All Do To Save America’s Future, has sold a whopping 362,813 hardcover copies to date, according to Nielsen BookScan, a service that tracks most bookstore sales.

To compare: If you take the combined hardcover sales of every other book written by a current Republican presidential contender since 2010 and add them together, you only get 252,177.

Carson’s dominance as an author has not necessarily translated to frontrunner status in the GOP presidential primaries, where he generally polls among the top cluster of candidates — at around 10% — but has not pulled away from the pack.

The book’s success does, however, illustrate how Carson’s specialized brand of charisma, emphasis on personal biography, and proud defiance of political correctness appeals to the book-buying masses of the Republican base.

It also comes at a moment when the conservative publishing industry has grown so large, and competitive, that many on the right fear it’s unsustainable. BuzzFeed News explored this phenomenon last year, in part, by examining the quadrennial rush to put out campaign manifestos by prospective presidential candidates. Publishing sources described bidding wars among the proliferation of conservative imprints, which have led to soaring advances that couldn’t be economically justified. Often, campaigns and political action committees end up spending thousands of dollars to inflate the books’ sales numbers.

So far, Carson’s book is shaping up to be a rare runaway bestseller in the sub-genre of candidate lit.

From BookScan, here are the total hardcover sales for each book released since 2010 by one of the current Republican presidential contenders:

American Dreams, by Marco Rubio: 7,807 hardcover copies sold
Unintimidated, by Scott Walker: 19,096
Taking a Stand, by Rand Paul: 7,795
Rising to the Challenge, by Carly Fiorina: 2,620
Immigration Wars, by Jeb Bush: 4,905
God, Guns, Grits, and Gravy, by Mike Huckabee: 65,939
Leadership and Crisis, by Bobby Jindal: 20,080
Midas Touch, by Donald Trump: 21,424
Fed Up!, by Rick Perry: 27,264
An American Son, by Marco Rubio: 36,786
Bella’s Gift, by Rick Santorum: 6,112
American Patriots, by Rick Santorum: 6,831
Government Bullies, by Rand Paul: 10,818
The Tea Party Goes To Washington, by Rand Paul: 10,778
Blue Collar Conservatives, by Rick Santorum: 3,919
TOTAL: 252,177
One Nation, by Ben Carson: 362,813

Ben Carson calls for banning sanctuary cities // Boston Herald // Chris Cassidy – July 7, 2015

Republican hopeful Ben Carson today offered a solution to prevent a similar murder like the shooting death in San Francisco allegedly committed by an illegal immigrant who had been previously deported five times.

“No sanctuary cities,” said Carson in response to an attendee’s question during a Politics & Eggs event at the Bedford Village Inn this afternoon. “I think that’s ridiculous.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Carson's comments came as Juan Francisco Lopez-Sanchez admitted in a TV interview he shot and killed 32-year-old Kathryn Steinle in a tourist-friendly section of San Francisco.

The shooting has sparked a nation-wide controversy because Lopez-Sanchez had been deported five times and San Francisco's status as a "Sanctuary City" for illegal immigrants prevented city officials from cooperating with the feds when he was released on drug charges the week before.

"You have to turn off the spigot that dispenses the goodies," said Carson. "If there's nothing for them to come here for, they're not going to risk coming in here."

Carson also said Donald Trump's message about stopping illegal immigration is being overshadowed by the language he's using, which was "perhaps a little inflammatory."

"I learned that a few months ago, to tone down the rhetoric," said Carson. "That's why you haven't heard me do that much lately because I want people to hear what I'm saying."

Later, he told reporters he doesn't think Trump is hurting the party.

"He is who he is," said Carson. "Could you imagine a Donald Trump who's, like, nice, mild-mannered and says everything in a very peaceful -- it wouldn't be Donald Trump."

He also believes he is a "shoo-in" to qualify among the top 10 candidates to appear on the stage for next month's first Republican primary debate.

FIORINA

Carly Fiorina Condemns Donald Trump for Comments on Mexicans // TIME // Sam Frizell – July 7, 2015

Carly Fiorina on Tuesday denounced Donald Trump's recent comments on Mexican immigrants, saying her fellow Republican presidential candidate "doesn't represent my party."

"Donald Trump has said many outrageous things in his career, and I suspect he's going to continue to say outrageous things," Fiorina said after touring a factor here. "He doesn't represent me, and he doesn't represent my party."

Macy's, NBC and other businesses have cut business ties with Trump, the reality television star and real estate mogul, after said during his campaign launch that the immigrants coming into the U.S. from Mexico are "rapists."

Fiorina, the former Hewlett-Packard chief executive, is seeking a place on the Republican debate stage this summer, a key step in gaining recognition in the race for the presidential nomination. She'll need to do well enough in national polls to debate her competitors on stage, a feat that could be complicated by Trump's entry into the race.

Trump has rocketed into second place in the race, according to a CNN poll released last week.

"I do think the media is sort of obsessed with him in a way that's bizarre to me," Fiorina said. "There's a lot going on in the world and everybody keeps asking about Donald Trump."

Fiorina is in the first-in-the-nation primary state of New Hampshire this week, meeting voters and touring local businesses.

Fiorina Responds: I've Done 24 TIMES As Many National TV Interviews As Hillary // The Daily Caller // Al Weaver – July 7, 2015

Hillary Clinton may have sat down for her first national television interview Tuesday, but the number pale in comparison to the only other female in the presidential contest thus far.

According to Carly Fiorina's campaign, the former Hewlett-Packard CEO has sat down for 24 national television interviews since her announcement May 4. The Fiorina camp also tweeted out a fun fact about the number of interviews she has done on a certain network that is not usually kind to Republicans.

Fiorina has done four such interviews on the "Lean Forward" network — two with "Morning Joe," one with "Mitchell Reports" host Andrea Mitchell, and another with "The Cycle" host Abby Huntsman.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a statement following the interview, which took place with CNN's Brianna Keilar, Fiorina took aim at the questions Clinton did not end up facing, adding that the GOP nominee will need to "hold Hillary accountable."

Stunning…and yet completely unsurprising. Hillary Clinton managed not to answer any substantive questions during that interview. And she wasn't even asked about her track record as Secretary of State. If we want to win back the White House in 2016, we need a Republican nominee who won't be afraid to hold Hillary accountable–who will ask her about Benghazi, who will ask her about her conflicts of interest while her family accepted money from countries with business before her, who will ask her why she thought a gimmicky red reset button would dissuade the ambitions of someone like Vladimir Putin.

'Rope line' jokes aplenty as Fiorina knocks Clinton // The Union Leader // Dan Tuohy – July 7, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Carly Fiorina casts herself as the anti-Hillary candidate. An audience in Portsmouth was happy to compare and contrast.

"Where's your rope line?" a man asked her Tuesday morning.

The grinning questioner was inspired by Democrat Hillary Clinton's use of a rope line to literally hold reporters back from covering her while she walked in the Fourth of July parade Saturday in Gorham. Others in the crowd at Geno's Chowder & Sandwich Shop in Portsmouth cracked the same joke.

Fiorina also teed up on it. "Ladies and gentlemen," she began her remarks, "I don't want to rope off the press."

Clinton's campaign says the rope was necessary in order to allow people along the route to meet and chat with the candidate.

Fiorina, who regularly criticizes Clinton and presents herself as the ideal Republican to take Clinton on in the general election, said she remains accessible to the press and has answered more than 600 questions since her failed bid for U.S. Senate in California in 2010.

Fiorina, the former chief executive officer of Hewlett-Packard, is running as a Washington outsider. She is on a week-long campaign swing through New Hampshire.

"Hillary Clinton cannot be President of these United States because she's not trustworthy," Fiorina said in Portsmouth. "She's not transparent. Despite her many titles, she lacks a track record of leadership, and the policies she is pursuing are doubling down on every failed policy of the Obama administration from the last seven years."

Fiorina continued to take aim at the "professional political class." She also dismissed billionaire businessman Donald J. Trump for his comments on Mexican illegal immigrants.

"Donald Trump is what he has always been -- a tireless self-promoter," she said in response to a reporter's question. "So he's going to say lots of outrageous things as he always has. He doesn't represent me and he doesn't represent my party."

In speaking to the audience at Geno's, which opened early for the occasion, said immigration reform takes money, manpower and political will power. She supports strengthening the nation's borders, but also said America must prioritize some basic steps, like fixing a broken employer verification system to ensure workers are legal.

Fiorina proposed cutting back on federal bureaucracy, rebuilding America's military, and repealing the Affordable Care Act and replacing it with a free-market, states-based solution, in which states manage high-risk pools.

One man asked her how she was answer the press when questioned on how she was "separated" from Hewlett-Packard. "I wasn't 'separated' from HP, ok, I was fired," Fiorina responded. She said she's proud of her record, and that she was challenging the status quo at her former company during a time of great upheaval in the tech world. She said other leaders -- citing Steve Jobs -- were fired for taking similar stands.

Fiorina said she has more endorsements in New Hampshire than any other candidate and is working a grassroots campaign to boost her standing in the first-in-the-nation primary state. She said that her name recognition was less than 4 percent when she started the campaign. And since that "standing start" on May 4, she has raised $1.4 million toward the presidential primary election.

Asked if she is now a top-tier candidate, Fiorina said it depends on how one defines it. But, she quickly added, she will be on the debate stage when Fox News and Facebook host the first televised GOP presidential debate Aug. 6. In a critical move, Fox News will limit the entry criteria to the top 10 candidates, based on five recent national public opinion polls.

JINDAL

Bobby Jindal mocked for posing with gun at campaign stop // The Economic Times – July 8, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Bobby Jindal has been mocked on Twitter for posting a photo of himself holding and admiring a weapon while at a campaign stop in Iowa last week.

"My kind of campaign stop; Capital Armament in Sibley," read the photo caption of Louisiana's Indian-American governor, inviting mocking comments, according to Atlanta Journal Constitution newspaper.

The company's Facebook page describes CapArms as a veteran-owned company that manufactures ammunition firearms and smokeless gunpowder.

A commentator accused Jindal, a strong supporter of gun ownership rights who has signed several pro-gun rights bills into law in his state, of pandering to constituents and calling him a poser.

Another called it Jindal's Dukakis moment, referencing the 1988 campaign photo of Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis riding in a tank.

Politico, an influential Washington newssite, referred to that image as one of the "worst campaign backfires in history."

Bobby Jindal: Sanders and Clinton Would Both Turn Us Into Greece // TIME // Bobby Jindal – July 7, 2015

Greece created democracy, and now the Greeks are showing us how to kill it.

It's simple math to understand what is happening in Greece right now. When Greece joined the euro, it benefited from the financial support of its more fiscally responsible neighbors in the euro zone. Rather than taking the opportunity to enact the structural reforms that could have increased growth — reforms that it still has not undertaken — Greece instead went on a spending spree funded by other people's money.

Greece has been cooking the books with complicated financial instruments for years. But the problems don't stop there. Greece's Rubik's Cube tax code and rampant corruption make tax evasion widespread. Golden parachute public pensions that allow public sector workers to retire as early as 45 drain dollars out of the government coffers while incentivizing a still healthy and work-age workforce to live on the public dime. It's hard to have sufficient tax paying workers when about 75% of Greek public-sector employees retire by the age 61.

After taking office in January, the Alexis Tsipras administration reversed promised privatization of state-owned assets like the Port of Piraeus. In 2011, the IMF predicted Greece could bring in 50 billion euros ($56 billion) from the sale of state assets, not to mention the savings from moving those employees off the public wage and benefit system. To date, it has raised about 3 billion euros.

Business has no interest in creating jobs when crushed by government regulation. Tspiras promised to raise the minimum wage, despite the economy spiraling out of control. It's not surprising the March unemployment rate stood at 25.6%.

This is the European nightmare. The way of Greece is where Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders will take us. It's simple math: You can't spend more than you take in. You can't make it impossible for business to thrive and expect the economy to grow. No wonder the U.S. has had a disappointing about 2% "recovery" growth. That's not an accident—it's the result of failed policies.

Clinton and Sanders are math deniers, like most of the Democrats in D.C. They want to grow the government economy instead of the real American economy. Rather than pursuing tax reform to improve growth or entitlement changes to reduce future expenditures, Clinton and Sanders are focused on spending trillions on Obamacare, giving free college to everyone, and raising the federal minimum wage.

This was all on plain view in New Hampshire this past weekend, where Clinton spent the weekend promoting a third term of President Barack Obama's failed policies. The irony is that her dishonesty and lack of transparency is a windfall for Sanders.

Sanders is rising in the polls. Why? Because he's honest. He freely admits that he believes in socialism, and Democrats are flocking to the only honest candidate running on their side. Sanders should write Clinton a thank you note.

Sanders may be saying what Clinton will not say, but the reality is they're both socialists. And if you want a peek into our future with Clinton or Sanders, then look at what's happening in Greece today. Sanders proudly said on Sunday that he wants to raise taxes.

Sanders and Clinton seem to believe prosperity lies in the hands of government. We know it lies in the hands of our people.

We have to stop pretending. Greece pretended that debt didn't matter for years. It pretended it could spend money it didn't have. It pretended that there was some mythical pot of money in Athens that didn't exist. It pretended that 1+1 didn't equal 2.

The politicians in Puerto Rico are no different. They are demanding that we change U.S. laws so that they can file for bankruptcy. They are even threatening to sway the presidential election in order to force candidates to agree with them. These are the same politicians that led the country to bankruptcy. Everyone knows exactly what is going on here — they are asking the U.S. taxpayers to pay for a bailout. That's where this leads, and we should be honest about it. I oppose this.

Unfortunately, we better admit that our politicians in Washington are taking us down the exact same road that Puerto Rico is on, and that Greece has gone down. The federal minimum wage has strangled economic growth in Puerto Rico. The Puerto Rican government tried to throw money at the problem with incentive programs to lure business — but that just cost money and didn't fix the structural problem, so the economy continued to stall.

I know because in Louisiana we reversed decades of outmigration, and we created more than 90,000 jobs by reducing regulations and cutting taxes. Louisiana's economy boomed. We can do the same for America's economy. If you want more borrowing and spending, then vote for the Democrats. We know where that leads — Greece and Puerto Rico have shown us how quickly irresponsible spending can kill a democracy.

Jindal back to Iowa, will fundraise with Grassley // Des Moines Register // Linh Ta – July 7, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal will make a campaign stop with Sen. Chuck Grassley in Marion Saturday.

Jindal, who is running for the Republican nomination for president, will make several other stops in Iowa including Cedar Rapids and Davenport.

Both Grassley and Jindal will visit the Foot and Ankle Specialists of Iowa in Marion for a meeting with press, along with a private fundraiser and roundtable. Jindal has spent 14 days in the state this year, with his most recent visits to July 4th parades in Urbandale and Windsor Heights.

The rest of the stops include:

Dubuque: 9 a.m., Saturday, breakfast stop at Courtside Grill, 2095 Holliday Drive

Cedar Rapids: 1 p.m., Saturday, town hall meeting at Cedar Rapids Museum of Art, 410 Third Ave.

Marion: 5 p.m. Saturday, fundraiser and roundtable with Sen. Chuck Grassley at Foot and Ankle Specialists of Iowa, 1215 Blairsferry Road

Davenport: 5 p.m., Sunday, town hall meeting at American Legion Post #26, 702 West 35th St.

Bobby Jindal super PAC drops $700k on Iowa commercials, website reports // Bayoubuzz – July 7, 2015

Gov. Bobby Jindal's Super PAC, Believe Again, is spending more than $700,000 on round of commercials that will keep Jindal for president ads on the air through August, the Washington Post reported.

The ads will air between July 13 and August 2, mostly in the major media markets of Des Moines, Sioux City and Cedar Rapids, the Post report said. The buy includes commercials running online and on some cable networks in the state.

of the TV ads that have been running in Iowa have been a spot that uses a speech where Jindal talks about how he doesn't like the use of terms he calls "hyphenated Americans" such as Indian-American. He goes on to talk about his views on immigration. The ad is titled "We Are All Americans."

Before that, an ad that aired in Iowa touted Jindal's support for religious freedom.

Jindal: No break for Puerto Rico in debt crisis // The Union Leader // Dave Solom on – July 7, 2015

Louisiana governor and presidential candidate Bobby Jindal said on Tuesday that he would oppose any legislation giving the U.S. territory of Puerto Rico a way out of its debt crisis that would leave lenders holding the bag.

He criticized Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton and fellow Republican Jeb Bush, former governor of Florida, for endorsing changes in U.S. bankruptcy laws that would enable Puerto Rico's public entities to restructure some $72 billion in debt.

Legislation has been introduced in Congress that would give the U.S. territory the same options the 50 states have when it comes to restructuring the debt of government-owned entities or municipalities.

U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, both Clinton rivals for the Democratic nomination, have also endorsed easing the bankruptcy laws for Puerto Rico.

Bush is so far the only Republican candidate to do so. "I think that Puerto Rico ought to be treated as other states are treated as it relates to restructuring," he said during a visit to the island in late April.

"We all know what's next," Jindal said in an interview with New Hampshire Union Leader editors and reporters. "There will be appeals for U.S. tax dollars for a bailout. We can't do that. We shouldn't do that. I don't know why Jeb Bush is calling for that change in the law. I hope he will reconsider his position."

Jindal linked Puerto Rico and Greece, both on the verge of a massive default, as examples of poor economic policies run amok, and said the United States has been heading in the same direction under President Obama.

"The most important domestic issue we have is to rescue the American Dream from becoming the European nightmare — more taxes, more spending, more regulation," he said. "Greece will be our future if we aren't careful."

More than a ribbon-cutter

The 44-year-old Louisiana native, whose parents immigrated from India, is considered a long-shot for the GOP nomination. His approval rating in Louisiana has plummeted to around 30 percent, as the state Legislature in June closed a $1.6 billion projected budget deficit, ending the state's biggest budget crisis since the late 1980s.

Jindal pointed out that he was elected governor by wide margins, "and then we actually did something after getting elected,"

"You want to be popular, cut ribbons and kiss babies," he said. "We've done some things in our state and the state is better for it." Those initiatives included a school-choice program and privatization of the state-run hospitals.

"We were coming out of Katrina," he said. "People were worried about 25 years of out-migration. Now we've had seven years of in-migration, credit upgrades and per-capita income is up."

The son of immigrants, Jindal said the current immigration system is broken. "We have low walls and a narrow gate," he said, "when we need high walls and a broader gate, meaning we need to secure the border and after that's done, make it easier to get here legally."

Once through the gate, he said, immigrants need to assimilate.

"They need to learn English, adopt our values, role up their shirtsleeves and learn to live here," he said. "I'm tired of hyphenated Americans. My parents love India, but they came here because they wanted their kids to become Americans."

Jindal opposes subsidies for solar energy, popular in New Hampshire, and for ethanol, popular in Iowa — both critical primary states.

"As Republicans, we say we don't want to be the party of big government, but we can't be the party of big business either. We can't say we don't want to pick winners and losers, so you can't give special treatment to solar, but we want to give special treatment to oil, gas and the sources that we favor. I am an all-of-the-above guy."

A defining election

A fiscal and social conservative, Jindal sees himself as a populist.

"The left thinks we aren't smart enough to choose our own health insurance, to decide where our kids should go to school, how we exercise our Second Amendment rights, how many Big Gulps you should drink," he said. "I think this election is about populism versus elitism."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jindal said his Roman Catholic faith informs every aspect of his life, including his politics and decision-making. As a teenager, he at first hid his interest in Christianity from his Hindu parents.

"I came to the Christian faith at 16," he said. "It took me seven years. It wasn't easy and it wasn't immediate. I may have been the only teenager who told his parents he was going to a party so he could go to church instead."

In his second visit to the Granite State so far in the campaign, Jindal said he appreciates the civility of the New Hampshire electorate. "One of the great things about New Hampshire and Iowa is that voters are respectful, intelligent and considerate," he said. "There are a lot of people who come to town halls who disagree with me. They want to tell me how wrong I am. They wait their turn, stand up and give you their piece, but they are not rude."

As regards his standing in the crowded GOP field, Jindal has faith in the biblical admonition, "Many who are first will be last, and many who are last will be first."

TRUMP

P.G.A. Moves Event From Donald Trump Golf Course // NYT // Brendan Prunty – July 7, 2015

About five years ago, when golf was going through an economic downswing, Donald Trump took the opportunity to buy in, scooping up failed properties. He already had courses emblazoned with his name around the world, but credibility? That eluded him.

Soon major golf tours came calling, bringing big-money, high-profile events to his courses. Major championships — the prized possessions of every club — came next. In short order, Trump had gone from outsider to having a seat in the club.

Now he is wondering if he will get to keep it.

"I've been very loyal to golf," Trump said Tuesday in a telephone interview. "I own 17 clubs. They all do great. We will see whether or not golf is loyal to me."

That is the question after the P.G.A. of America on Tuesday became the first major golf organization to pull an event from one of Trump's properties in response to Trump's racially insensitive remarks last month about Mexican immigrants during a speech in which he announced his candidacy for the Republican nomination for president.

The P.G.A. Grand Slam of Golf — a year-end exhibition among the winners of the four men's major championships — was scheduled for October at Trump National Golf Club in Los Angeles.

Instead, it will be moved to a yet-to-be-determined location.

Trump said it was a mutually agreed upon move to protect his friends in the organization from dealing with potential backlash over his remarks, in which he said, referring to Mexican immigrants: "They're bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists." He later added, "And some, I assume, are good people."

The P.G.A. and L.P.G.A. issued statements on Tuesday, with the P.G.A. saying "we understand and support" the decision. The L.P.G.A. said that the Women's British Open at Trump's Turnberry Resort later this month would be staged as scheduled, adding that "a change in venue for this prestigious major simply isn't feasible without significantly diminishing the event."

"I think those statements are unnecessary," Trump said. "The voters of this country agree with me. All you have to do is look at the polls."

Trump later told a Golf Channel reporter days after the June 16 speech that he had "tremendous support from the golf world, because they all know I'm right," referring to his remarks about Mexican immigrants.

That led the U.S.G.A., P.G.A. Tour, L.P.G.A. Tour and the P.G.A. of America to issue a joint statement disputing Trump's claims.

In addition to the Women's British Open at the Turnberry Resort, which Trump purchased last year, three other major championships will be held at his courses by 2022: the 2017 United States Women's Open (at Trump National in Bedminster, N.J.), the 2017 Senior P.G.A. Championship (at Trump National in Potomac Falls, Va.) and the 2022 P.G.A. Championship at his Bedminster course.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And as part of that deal last year with the P.G.A. of America, it moved the Grand Slam of Golf from its traditional home in Bermuda to Trump's Los Angeles course in a multiyear deal that runs through 2018. The P.G.A. of America's statement about the move, however, noted that it was for this year.

"I think a lot of people are surprised that it wasn't all or nothing," said the former P.G.A. of America president Ted Bishop. "I don't know what kind of statement the P.G.A. of America makes by saying, 'We're not going to do this for one year, but we're going to go back for all these others.' "

Bishop, who was ousted from the organization last year after he made public comments that were widely seen as sexist, was part of the group that entered into a multi-event deal with Trump in 2014. He said that both he and the former P.G.A. of America chief executive Joe Steranka originally wanted nothing to do with Trump or his growing grip on the sport. But once Pete Bevacqua took over for Steranka, he said, he pushed for the two sides to do more business.

In addition to his own original-design golf properties, Trump had increasingly begun acquiring more pieces of the golf market. He purchased the financially struggling properties in Colts Neck and Pine Hill, N.J. He bought the Doral Resort & Spa — and its famous Blue Monster course, which hosts the W.G.C.-Cadillac Championship — out of bankruptcy in 2012. When the U.S.G.A. awarded him a United States Women's Open in 2012, the door had been opened for others to follow suit.

And if, at the end of the day, golf is not loyal back?

"I have wonderful alternatives," Trump said. "It's called — I'll make a fortune."

GOP donors call for sidelining Donald Trump // Politico // Nick Gass – July 7, 2015

At least one top Republican donor wants the party to keep Donald Trump from the debate stage.

"Someone in the party ought to start some sort of petition saying, 'If Trump's going to be on the stage, I'm not going to be on there with him,'" Republican donor John Jordan told The Associated Press on Monday, according to a report published Tuesday. "I'm toying with the idea of it."

"It's something I feel strongly about as somebody who not only cares about the Republican Party, but also Latinos," he added.

The comments come in the wake of a letter sent by Wyoming-based investor Foster Friess, another top GOP donor, calling for candidates to stay on the "civility reservation," according to AP.

"Our candidates will benefit if they all submit to Ronald Reagan's 11th Commandment, 'Thou shall not speak ill of a fellow Republican,'" Friess wrote in a letter late last week to Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus, obtained by the AP.

Republican presidential candidates, from New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie to Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, have routinely pointed out flaws in their fellow partisans.

Nearly all of the Republican candidates roundly rejected Trump's remarks last month that Mexico and other countries are sending rapists and murderers across the border, for example.

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, however, declined to condemn Trump's comments, telling NBC's "Meet the Press" that he was not going to be a party to "Republican-on-Republican violence." Christie responded to those remarks on Fox News, calling it "ironic" that the senator is giving "lectures" on the issue after Christie accused Cruz of sponsoring ads against incumbent Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee in the 2014 election cycle.
According to a copy of Mike Huckabee's response to Friess obtained by the AP, the former Arkansas governor said he "hope[s] that we don't commit fratricide again as a party."

Workers Building Trump Hotel Present Different Immigrant Image // NBC News // Suzanne Gamboa – July 7, 2015

Against the political noise of Donald Trump's anti-Mexican, anti-immigrant declarations and the ensuing backlash, the clank of hammers, clunking of wood and the high-pitched whine of heavy machinery inside a Trump construction site in the nation's capital goes on.

Many of the workers, though not all, are immigrants or Latino, or both, and have been on site of the Old Post Office Pavilion on Pennsylvania Avenue — about midway between the Capitol and the White House — since early in the morning and for many days.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Tuesday, during breaks and while leaving at the end of their long day, they wore their work on their clothing and on their skin — splattered paint, dust, the exhaustion of their labor under a tough sun.

In his presidential bid, Trump told his audience of supporters that Mexico was sending to the U.S. people who weren't like them. Instead, Mexico was sending problems: rapists, criminals and drug runners, he said.

Few of the workers at the construction site wanted to discuss Trump's comments when asked about them a day after the Washington Post ran a front-page story about the workers on the hotel development billed as a $200 million project.

The Post reported that several of the workers were immigrants and many were citizens or working legally, but laborers also told the Post that many had first entered the U.S illegally.

Many of the workers interviewed were from El Salvador or Honduras, reflective of the Washington, D.C., Latino population. Larger Mexican immigrant populations are found in communities around the district.

Those that did talk to reporters Tuesday said Trump was crazy or that he clearly didn't know that the people who work on his projects are decent people.

"They've come here to work, to get ahead, not to do anything bad," one worker who would not divulge any personal information told NBC. "All the ones I know, at least, are workers, not rapists."

Their stories as reported by the Post give a different view of immigration, one that shows the complexity of the lives of people and their status in the U.S. — here illegally, once here legally but now a citizen, a legal resident, here with temporary protected status.

Although Trump has pegged them as problems, the workers' toil away making a luxury hotel out of a historic building complex that houses the official Bells of Congress gifted to the U.S. from Britain during the nation's bicentennial and a 315-foot clock tower dating to 1899.

There's no mistaking who is reaping at least some of the benefit of these laborers' work.

The blue banners atop fencing across the front of the construction site announce the developer in large white letters: TRUMP.

It's a brand that Trump himself acknowledged is becoming increasingly tarnished. Often associated with success, wealth and excess, Trump's brand is increasingly being connected to racism and xenophobia.

Businesses have been severing ties with Trump, including NBC, Univision, Macy's and Serta Mattresses.

"I didn't know it was going to be quite this severe," Trump said on "Fox & Friends" of the backlash since his statements.

On Tuesday, the Professional Golfers Association pulled this year's Grand Slam of Golf from Trump National course in Los Angeles.

"I think Donald Trump knew he was going to be provocative and knew he was going to get pushback, but I believe he didn't think the pushback would actually come in the form of being dropped by sponsorships and contracts," said political analyst Victoria Francesco de Soto.

"Trump is losing out real money and his brand is being harmed," she said. "We all know Trump has that outrageous provocative brand, but it's going a bit deeper."

Take on Trump? GOP senators opt against it // The Hill // Alexander Bolton – July 8, 2015

Donald Trump's recent comments on illegal immigrants from Mexico are giving Republicans heartburn, but GOP senators are leery of criticizing the billionaire real estate mogul.

Their reluctance to rip the presidential hopeful for claiming that many Mexicans crossing the U.S. border are drug dealers and rapists could be used by Democrats who are aiming to regain control of the upper chamber.

Hispanic voters make up a large portion of the electorate in three battlegrounds that could determine who wins the Senate majority next year: Colorado, Florida and Nevada.
Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) on Tuesday dodged a question about Trump's controversial remarks.

"I'm focused on fixing No Child Left Behind," he said, referring to the pending education bill. "There are plenty of candidates in the presidential race who can deal with each other on those issues. I'm not going to get into it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said he disagrees with Trump's characterization, but declined to condemn the remarks.

"My state has been enriched by the Hispanic influence. We're a much better place. We have a close and warm relationship across our southern border with our Mexican friends, so, frankly, I just disagree," said McCain, who is running for reelection in 2016.

When asked if Trump's comments would hurt the party, McCain said, "I'll leave that to others to decide."

"There are serious issues involved, and they need to be treated seriously, and foremost we need to treat all the people involved with the dignity and respect they deserve," said Senate Republican Whip John Cornyn (Texas).

He declined to characterize Trump's comments as a mistake.

"I'm not running for president. You'll have to ask [them]," Cornyn added.

Some of Trump's rivals on the campaign trail have criticized the TV personality's claims about immigrants. But Republican lawmakers aren't showing an interest in going toe-to-toe with Trump.

The 2016 candidate is surging in the polls, attracting a lot of media attention, and he's shown he likes to fire back at Washington insiders.

Establishment Republicans are growing increasingly concerned that Trump will be a huge distraction throughout the upcoming cycle.

One GOP donor floated the idea of barring Trump from presidential debates, and while some Republican strategists privately embrace the idea, lawmakers are keeping their distance.

Trump is famously litigious and not afraid to use scorched-earth tactics to respond to his critics. While his negative characterization of illegal Mexican immigrants has caused corporate partners to recoil, they have helped him gain traction with the Republican base.

Trump's nationwide support has increased to 12 percent, according to a recent CNN/ORC poll, putting him in second place, behind former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. He stood at 3 percent in the polls when he announced his candidacy in mid-June.

Some Republicans worry that if the party excludes Trump from the debates or attacks him personally, the strategy could backfire by provoking him to wage a third-party campaign in the general election.

"The Republican candidates who decide to take him on and attack him do so at their peril and the party's peril because the worst thing for Republicans is for Trump to go through the primaries and make a third-party run," said John Ullyot, a GOP strategist and former senior Senate aide.

They fear a replay of H. Ross Perot, who at the very least hampered former President George H.W. Bush's reelection chances in 1992. Perot won 19 percent of the national vote, and Bill Clinton was elected as the country's 42nd president.

Over the last several weeks, corporate giants including Macy's, NBC and Univision have cut ties with Trump. In Washington, prominent local restaurateur José Andrés has come under pressure to reconsider opening a new restaurant at the Old Post Office, which Trump is converting into a luxury hotel.

Trump has not backed down and pointed to the fatal shooting of a San Francisco woman last week. Kathryn Steinle was shot allegedly by a man who had a long criminal record and had been deported to Mexico five times.

A spokeswoman for Trump said she had no comment for this article.

Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) said he thought Trump stumbled in his comments but defended his right to speak his mind.

"I just don't think he has a lot of experience with presidential politics even though he's been there a few times. He's undoubtedly going to make some mistakes, and I think that was one," Hatch said.

The Finance Committee chairman argues that Trump's remarks will give other GOP candidates a chance to portray themselves in a more favorable light by offering a clear contrast.

"I think it will give other Republicans a chance to shine," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He could play a very good role if he will. He's a smart guy, he's a very successful guy. I know him personally. I like him personally, but he's a person who says what he believes and what he thinks. That's something to be admired, even if you disagree with him," Hatch added.

Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) said Trump could have expressed himself more deftly but that he did not necessarily say anything inaccurate.

"I believe the facts would show that some people, certainly not the majority, if they get in trouble with the law in foreign countries, if they can get to the United States, they can avoid going to jail," he said. "And we know a huge amount of our drugs are coming across our border.

GOP strategists acknowledge that Trump is hurting their party's effort to reach out to Hispanic voters.

"Undoubtedly it has hurt the Republican brand with Hispanics, but it will also give us an opportunity as Republicans to have a conversation with Hispanic voters about what it means to be an immigrant to this country and how we should do this in a safe and orderly fashion," said Patrick Davis, a GOP strategist and former political director of the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

Democrats have pounced on Trump's words to paint the broader Republican Party as hostile to immigrants.

Hillary Clinton, the current Democratic presidential front-runner, told CNN in an interview Tuesday that she feels "very bad and very disappointed with him and with the Republican Party for not responding."

Unlike other GOP presidential contenders, Texas Sen. Ted Cruz has praised Trump for putting a national spotlight on the southwestern border.

"I salute Donald Trump for focusing on the need to address illegal immigration," Cruz told host Chuck Todd on NBC's "Meet The Press." "I like Donald Trump. He is bold, he is brash."

"He has a colorful way of speaking, and it's not my way of speaking, but I salute him," Cruz added.

Donald Trump Employees' 401(k) Plans Come With a Huge Catch // TIME // Susie Poppick – July 7, 2015

It turns out that Donald Trump—the real estate mogul and Republican presidential hopeful who has promised to be "the greatest jobs president that God ever created"—is a bit of a Scrooge when it comes to his employees' retirement plans.

Workers who are eligible for Trump's company 401(k) cannot actually open an account until they have been employed by the tycoon for a year, Bloomberg reports. And the employer match—a generous-enough 4.5% for employees who invest at least 6% of their earnings—doesn't kick in for six years. (That's the longest amount of time allowed by United States law).

While these policies may simply signal how much Trump values loyalty, one other important 401(k) feature is lacking in the plan: automatic enrollment. Studies have shown that by automatically signing employees up for savings, employers can greatly boost how much workers end up having for retirement.

"If the plan really wanted to facilitate employee savings, it would institute automatic enrollment, reduce or eliminate the eligibility requirement, and vest employees in the employer match more quickly," Harvard Kennedy School professor Brigitte Madrian told Bloomberg.

These GOP Candidates Are Standing Behind Donald Trump // Mother Jones // Allie Gross – July 7, 2015

Following Donald Trump's controversial comments suggesting that Mexican immigrants are "rapists" who bring drugs and crime to America, his fellow 2016 contenders have largely condemned his inflammatory remarks. But a handful of Republican hopefuls have either defended the real estate mogul or, in one case, fled a question on the subject to avoid going on the record.

Rick Santorum, Ted Cruz, and Ben Carson are standing behind Trump. They have defended (even applauded) the billionaire, in what might be attempts to appeal to conservatives opposed to immigration reform.

During an appearance on Meet the Press on Sunday, Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) said, "I salute Donald Trump for focusing on the need to address illegal immigration." He chalked up Trump's divisive rhetoric as a "colorful way of speaking." According to Cruz, the controversy is merely an attempt by the media to get Republicans to criticize each other, but he is "not interested in Republican-on-Republican violence" and therefore "ain't gonna do it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rick Santorum also came out on #teamtrump. The former senator told CBS' Face the Nation on Sunday that he did not like Trump's "verbiage," but said that Trump "focused on a very important issue for American workers, and particularly legal immigrants in this country."

Referring to the storm that followed Trump's remarks, Ben Carson contended that political correctness was overshadowing the debate about immigration reform. "It's the P.C. police out in force," Carson told the Daily Caller. "They want to make very clear that this is a topic you're not supposed to bring up." Carson, a former neurosurgeon, said that "our illegal immigration problem," not Trump, should be the focus of attention. His solution? "Secure all our borders—north, south, east and west," with electronic surveillance devices, drones, or people.

Rand Paul isn't exactly on #teamtrump, but he has been conspicuously silent on Trump's remarks. Last week, an Iowa voter posted a video to Twitter that showed her asking Paul for his opinion on Trump's statement and being met with no reply.

Donald Trump Taking Message To Hollywood For GOP Event Friday // Deadline // Liosa de Morales – July 7, 2015

Donald Trump's coming to town. Trump people confirm he is speaking to the group of Hollywood conservatives who go by the name Friends of Abe. The event is scheduled for 7:30 PM on Friday at the Luxe Sunset Blvd Hotel in Brentwood, the invite says.

The most controversial of the ever-expanding pack of GOP White House hopefuls is the latest paying a visit to the group. Other Republican contenders already have paid a call, but, of course, Carly Fiorina, Rand Paul and Mike Huckabee have not made headlines saying Mexico is sending its drug users and rapists across the border into the United States, so their visits to Abe's pals went largely unnoticed.

"We are delighted to hear from Donald Trump as we are from all 2016 Republican candidates," a member of the Tinseltown organization told Deadline. The invite sent to Friends of Abe members asks them to come for a "dinner and insightful discussion" with Trump. The ex-Celebrity Apprentice host is called "the very definition of American success" on the invite. Trump's camp confirmed he is scheduled to speak at the private event.

Friends of Abe was founded by the likes of Gary Sinise, Jon Voight and Kelsey Grammer several years ago as a discussion group for embattled Hollywooders with conservative tendencies. Having grown now to more than 2,200 members, the media-avoiding FoA has become a station on the notable GOP presidential and fundraising path as candidates and the Republican Party try to get their hands on Tinseltown cash via networking at the group's low-key events.

Word of Trump's visit came as Hillary Clinton was clobbering him on CNN over his comments about Mexican immigration. "I'm very disappointed in those comments and I feel very bad, and very disappointed with him and with the Republican party for not responding immediately and saying, 'Enough! Stop It!'," Clinton told CNN's senior political correspondent Brianna Keilar in Clinton's first nationally televised interview since officially announcing her candidacy three months ago.

Trump this week acknowledged the remark he made about illegal immigrants coming across the border with Mexico in announcing his White House bid in mid-June, has cost him more business than he expected. Most notably, he has sued Univision for dumping plans to broadcast the Miss USA and Miss Universe Pageants, which he co-owns with NBC, which also has bailed on the beauty pageant broadcasts, and said it is getting out of business with him. In LA today, pro golf's PGA backed out of October's PGA Grand Slam of Golf tourney that had been scheduled at Trump National golf course in Palos Verdes.

Clinton, however, said Trump is only in keeping with all of the GOP presidential candidates' immigration stances, which she described as a "spectrum" of "hostility" on immigration in which all of the Republican hopefuls are opposed to providing a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants — by way of seguing to her "talk about comprehensive immigration reform."

How much money will running for president cost Donald Trump? // CNN // MJ Lee – July 7, 2015

Donald Trump's foes want to hit him where it hurts: His wallet.

A slew of corporations from Macy's to NBC to ESPN to NASCAR have abandoned business deals with the Republican presidential candidate after he remarked that some immigrants crossing into the U.S. from Mexico were "rapists." The PGA was one of the latest organizations to dump the bombastic businessman, announcing on Tuesday that it would not hold its 2015 Grand Slam of Golf tournament at a Trump golf course in Los Angeles.

All told, the loss of income could add up to millions of dollars. But until Trump files detailed financial disclosure forms, it is difficult to estimate just how hard his profits may take a hit. Trump's assets tied to the Miss Universe, Miss USA and Miss Teen USA pageants that he partially owns and were dropped by Univision and NBC are estimated to be around $15 million.

That's a large sum of money but to a self-claimed multi-billionaire like Trump, it's small change. Trump says his net worth is close to $9 billion. About a third of that -- $3.3 billion -- is tied up in "real estate licensing deals, brand and branded developments," according to a summary of Trump's net worth as of last year. The vast majority of the rest of Trump's assets are in residential and commercial properties, as well as real estate investments.

Some experts say these assets would be largely shielded from the corporate backlash. Dwight Hill, a retail expert, said he would expect any financial loss Trump experiences from the fallout of his comments to be just a "blip."

"At the end of the day, his real wealth and holdings is obviously real estate," Hill said. "I'm sure there will be some boycott of his hotels but I just don't see it as having a long term lasting affect on his brand."

A Trump spokeswoman declined to answer several questions about the details of Trump's finances.

In his typical brash style, Trump has dismissed the flood of business deals he's lost over the course of a few weeks.

"The disassociation of ESPN and NASCAR with the Trump Organization was covered by the press in headlines all over the world as though it was a major setback for me. Really? What were the losses?" Trump said in a statement Tuesday.

He went on to boast that he will now turn a bigger profit in part by keeping large portions of the deposits from ESPN and NASCAR.

But Trump's public statements seem to belie a recognition that the recent events have put a serious dent in his brand.

One person in Trump's inner circle, who spoke anonymously to share Trump's private thoughts, said the businessman was genuinely stung by NBC's decision to sever ties with him. Even after announcing his presidential campaign, Trump had always expected to return to being host of "The Apprentice" — a platform that has been central to creating an image of a tough boardroom CEO and experienced business leader.

"I don't think it has anything to do with money. It has everything to do with prestige," this person said.

Meanwhile, his critics say they are determined to make the depth of their anger known.

The Hispanic business community, for one, is galvanizing around a boycott of Trump brands and properties. Spearheading that effort, the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce announced that it would no longer consider Trump hotels as potential venues for two of its upcoming conventions. The Chamber's president, Javier Palomarez, said Trump would have profited several million dollars if he had won the bid to host those gatherings.

And Palomarez added that the consequence for Trump will be far wider-ranging than just that: many of the Chamber's sister organizations are joining the boycott, he said, in what Palomarez expects will be a sustained and nationwide anti-Trump campaign.

"What you're seeing is the tip of the spear," Palomarez told CNN. "For every brand that you hear that's leaving him there's probably 20 or 30 more brands that have left him ... all the way down to families who were going to vacation at a Trump property -- it goes that far downstream."

New York's elected officials are also repudiating one of Manhattan's best-known celebrities.

New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio announced earlier this month that the city will "review" its existing contracts with Trump, calling the GOP candidate's comments about immigrants "disgusting" and "hateful." Trump's company operates the Trump Golf Links golf course in the Bronx that opened earlier this year, as well as an ice skating facility in Central Park.

Donald Trump defiant on business fallout amid fresh salvos on immigration // The Guardian // Ben Jacobs – July 7, 2015

Donald Trump says “making America great is more important to me than my company”.

In a phone interview with Greta Van Susteren of Fox News, the controversial billionaire took shots at critics, suggested Jeb Bush’s policy ideas were “baby stuff” and accidentally pressed at least one button on his telephone while talking.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump's business interests have suffered significant damage since his announcement speech when he suggested that undocumented immigrants crossing the border between the US and Mexico were "bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists."

He shot back at the latest round of companies to cancel contracts with his venues he owns. In recent days, ESPN and Nascar have cancelled events at Trump-owned properties.

Trump jibed that Nascar had simply rented a ballroom from him and lost a big deposit as a result. He gleefully proclaimed: "I'll rent it to somebody else." The former Celebrity Apprentice host also said ESPN was being forced to hold a golf tournament at "a course which isn't nearly as nice".

The real estate mogul also took a far more extreme stance on immigration than he had in the past. The Republican presidential hopeful claimed: "Mexico sends many criminals back in" to the US and went on to say that an illegal immigrant who allegedly killed a woman in San Francisco this week was "forced back in" to the US by Mexico.

The real estate mogul also engaged in plenty of hyperbole. Trump asserted that he has been the only candidate "who has brought up illegal immigration" despite the fact that issue has been a subject of ferocious debate in American politics for decades. He also cited an article in the "Huffington Post, which has me No 1." The article Trump cited, by associate editor Igor Bobic, was more than a little tongue-in-cheek.

In the meantime, Republican insiders worried about the rise of Trump in recent polls do have at least one silver lining from his interview. Trump insisted he wasn't planning on mounting a third party bid for the presidency and that "my thinking was to run as a Republican".

Obama's housing chief calls Trump 'de facto face' of GOP // The Boston Globe // Jim O'Sullivan – July 7, 2015

US Housing and Urban Development Secretary Julian Castro on Tuesday warned Republicans that permitting Donald Trump to serve as "the de facto face of the party" while he describes immigrants in inflammatory terms could cost them the presidential election.

Castro, a former San Antonio mayor widely considered a short-list candidate to be a 2016 running mate on the Democratic side, described his party's primary as "a real race."

Visiting Dorchester for a ribbon-cutting with Mayor Martin J. Walsh, President Obama's housing chief told reporters that Trump's comments last month that Mexican immigrants are "rapists" would plague the GOP if the real estate magnate continues to be seen as its representative.

"The Republican Party needs to do a much better job of reaching out, of creating a big tent, if they want to win in 2016," Castro said. "Donald Trump is now the de facto face of the Republican Party. He has one of the highest name ID, he's on TV all the time, and if this is the platform the Republican Party has for immigrants, then they can kiss the 2016 election goodbye."

Several Republican presidential candidates have sought to distance themselves from Trump and disassociate him from the party's mainstream. A string of business partners have ended their partnerships with Trump.

"They're bringing drugs, they're bringing crime. They're rapists," Trump said at his June 16 campaign announcement. "And some, I assume, are good people."

Castro, 41, continued to shrug off questions about a potential bid for the vice presidency. He told the Globe he had not spoken with the Democratic front-runner, former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton, since a Center for American Progress event in March. Joining her on the 2016 ticket, if she wins the nomination, did not come up, he said.

Asked about the Democratic field, where US Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont has picked up momentum against Clinton, Castro called it "a real race."

"It's good that we have an active field on both the Democratic side and the Republican side," Castro said. "That's good for democracy, and on the Democratic side and the Republican side, it gives voters the opportunity to hear a variety of perspectives. That's positive.

"I've stayed out of the presidential race so far," he said. "At the right time, later on down the road, I'll get involved."

WALKER

Nearing launch, Walker team sees Bush, Rubio as 2016 competition // WaPo // Dan Balz – July 7, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker is poised to become the 15th Republican to declare his presidential bid, with at least one more candidate expected to enter soon after. But at this point, his campaign advisers said this week that they see just two principal rivals for the GOP nomination: former Florida governor Jeb Bush and Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.).

Walker will make his intentions clear Monday with an announcement and rally in suburban Waukesha County, the heart of Republican territory in Wisconsin. The venue will be the same place where he celebrated his victory in a 2012 recall election, one more indication that he intends to make his battles with public employee unions in the state the centerpiece of his appeal to conservative activists.

Walker has weathered repeated controversies as governor and rocky periods during the past six months as he has prepared to formally join the race. He jumped into the top tier in January with a fiery speech at a GOP gathering in Iowa, but was hurt by a series of missteps and statements. He has faced questions about whether he has changed his positions or tone on immigration, abortion and same-sex marriage. Other Republicans say the momentum he once had has abated.

None of that appears to have unsettled Walker or his advisers. With a super PAC called “Unintimidated” — named for the biographical book Walker published about his battles in Wisconsin — the candidate and his advisers are confident as they look ahead to the campaign.

They consider Walker uniquely equipped among the candidates to appeal across the spectrum of the Republican Party. “There are three legs of the stool,” campaign manager Rick Wiley said in an interview. “We play in all three. Who else does?”

Some of Walker’s competitors will no doubt try to prove his team wrong in that.

Tea party activists, Wiley said, like Walker’s fighting style and that he won multiple elections while under siege. His roots as the son of a Baptist minister and his faith give him a reach into the GOP’s social conservative wing.

Beyond that, advisers argued that — as a second-term governor who has raised more than $80 million for his Wisconsin campaigns — Walker has appeal in establishment circles, even if he can’t match Bush’s fundraising prowess.

Walker’s path to victory, as outlined by his closest advisers, is not significantly different from that of his rivals, but his team says the calendar sets up well for him.

Iowa is the key: Walker is leading the polls there and, as a neighboring governor, he has easy access to the state. His advisers expect him to win the Iowa caucuses early next year, and they say he can follow that with top-three finishes in New Hampshire and South Carolina. They also think he can score an early victory in Nevada’s caucuses.

Walker’s advisers doubt that anyone who doesn’t win one of the four early states will move to the heavy schedule of contests in March. They also doubt that anyone will have enough delegates to clinch the nomination by the end of March, and they anticipate that the race will drag on into May before there is a winner.

The enthusiastic reaction to Walker’s speech at the January GOP forum in Iowa produced some obvious dividends. The sudden and positive attention helped with fundraising and grass-roots organizing. But the scrutiny that came with it, compounded by Walker’s wobbly handling of various issues, brought the team its first crisis.

At the time, Walker was just beginning to build his campaign. He lacked the infrastructure to deal with the self-inflicted wounds. “None of our senior staff had even been to Madison,” Wiley said. “It’s amazing we survived.”

The small team stepped up its recruiting and brought on policy advisers who could provide Walker with briefings to become more fluent in key issues. By the end of March, the campaign decided to scale back. For the next month or so, Walker made few public appearances, concentrating on policy briefings and fundraising meetings.

“We had to slow it down,” Wiley said.

Walker formed his first committee last winter, a "527" that allowed him to raise money but did not advocate directly for him as a candidate. The super PAC was formed in April. Walker has held at least 30 meetings with prospective donors since then, said longtime adviser Keith Gilkes, who heads the super PAC.

The combined take for the two committees during the first six months of the year is expected to top $20 million when reports are issued later this month. The super PAC has commitments for an additional $5 million or so, Gilkes said, and hopes to raise at least $20 million by the end of the year, giving it $40 million to start with in 2016.

Walker advisers said his past battles in Wisconsin have given him the kind of grass-roots foundation that no other candidate can match. He has a list of 300,000 or so donors, and his super PAC had more than 200 donors as of a few weeks ago. Walker advisers said they think that is smaller than Bush's super PAC but larger than those of most of the other candidates.

Beyond that, advisers said, Walker has a list of e-mail addresses that numbers about 700,000. One adviser said that is substantially more than Mitt Romney had by the time he had wrapped up the 2012 GOP nomination.

Walker has come under fresh criticism recently for changing his position on immigration — he once supported a path to citizenship for those here illegally — and for changing his tone, if not his position, on same-sex marriage and abortion.

Gilkes said Walker has not changed his stance on those two issues, although he suggested that the governor's priorities are more fiscal and economic than social. "His beliefs never change," he said.

Another adviser said Walker's call for a constitutional amendment to give states the right to define marriage would end up being a plus, saying Rubio and Bush probably hurt themselves among social conservatives by not reacting more vigorously to last month's Supreme Court decision that legalized same-sex marriage.

Walker advisers discount possible threats from others in the establishment wing such as Ohio Gov. John Kasich and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie. Nor do they see a major threat yet in Iowa from those competing hardest for the social and religious conservatives.

"My feeling is every single one of the candidates is focused on Walker in Iowa," Gilkes said. "I don't think that's ever going to let up."

Walker's team has conducted two focus groups in Iowa. It has concluded that, although he is not well known, the governor has significant opportunities to expand his appeal. The focus group was shown various videos about Walker and were receptive to the portrayal of his record in Wisconsin. "We have so much to work with," Wiley said.

For months, Walker's team has been preparing for a race against Bush's money and Rubio's compelling personal story. Advisers said Walker's record as governor is more current than Bush's and draws a sharper contrast with President Obama. Rubio has attributes that Walker has spoken about favorably in private conversations, but the governor's campaign advisers consider the first-term senator far less tested.

Walker's announcement tour will take him from Wisconsin to Nevada, South Carolina, New Hampshire and then back to Iowa for several days of campaigning. In New Hampshire, he will hold one town hall meeting. He will return to that state later in the month for an event that includes a Harley-Davidson motorcycle ride.

His announcement speech will focus heavily on his record in Wisconsin, reprising his fights with unions. As for his promise to put forth "big and bold" ideas, one adviser said not to expect that in the announcement. Any such policies will be introduced later in the year.

Tea partiers and liberals tell Gov. Scott Walker: 'No more games on Common Core' // WaPo // Valerie Strauss – July 7, 2015

Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, who is expected soon to announce his bid for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination, has been inconsistent at best on the Common Core State Standards, being for it before being against it. Now he is being called out on his Core position by an unusual coalition of groups and individuals — in an open letter titled "No More Games on Common Core" — that includes tea parties across Wisconsin as well as liberals and libertarians.

The group of signatories to the letter accuses the governor of pretending to be against Common Core but not taking the steps required to eliminate it in Wisconsin. A Walker spokesman says the governor is acting to give Wisconsin school districts the freedom to do what they want on the Core. (See full statement below.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here's some Walker history regarding the Common Core:

In 2011, his first budget for Wisconsin called for creation of a test that was aligned to the Core standards, which were in place in the state before he became governor. A reading task force he chaired issued a report in January 2012 expressing support for the Core, and as the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel reported here, Walker was seen as being "on board" with the Core in the first half of 2013 by Alan J. Borsuk, an education fellow at Marquette University, in a Journal Sentinel commentary.

But things began to change in 2013, when his second budget, while not rescinding the standards, directed the state Department of Public Instruction to stop ordering districts to continue implementing the Core. In January 2014, the Journal Sentinel reported, he said he was creating a commission to take a new look at the standards, and in July of that year, he called for the Core to be rescinded in Wisconsin. That seems pretty concrete, but in early 2015, his message was that he didn't want Wisconsin districts required to use the Core if they didn't want to, which is less than an full-out repeal.

In his latest budget request, Walker has defunded the Common Core assessment developed by the multi-state, federally funded Smarter Balanced Assessment Consortium and now has the state looking for a new "accountability" test. But there are questions about what the state is looking for in a new test and whether it can still be aligned to the Common Core. If the new state accountability exam is aligned to the Core, districts would have little choice but to choose to implement the Common Core standards, even if they were permitted not to.

Opposition to the Common Core has been rising for years from across the political spectrum with concerns including problems with the content of the standards and the developmental inappropriateness of those for the earliest grades, the design of the new tests, how the new exams were written and by whom, and the federal government's funding of new standardized tests aligned to the Core. Some far-right wing conservatives have taken criticism of the Core to ridiculous extremes; Phyllis Schlafly, for example, says it actively promotes gay marriage and Glenn Beck has called the standards initiative "evil" and an attempt to impose "communism" on America. The Freedom Project, affiliated with the radical right John Birch Society, has said the Core is an "absolute appropriation of Soviet ideology and propaganda."

But a coalition of groups – mostly tea parties and other hard-right conservatives — have just issued the letter calling for Walker to take a definitive stand on Common Core and Core testing in language that was sensible enough for some liberals and libertarians to sign on. Here's the letter, and following it is the full comment from a Walker spokesperson in Madison.

Scott Walker hoping new bundlers help vault him over fundraising hurdles // CNN // Sara Murray – July 7, 2015

When you're up against a candidate who belongs to a political dynasty and has a fundraising network that spans decades, there is perhaps only one option: Bring in new blood.

As Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker readies his likely presidential campaign, one of his biggest near-term hurdles is building a war chest that will allow him to face off against well-funded opponents.

To do that his team said it is targeting a new generation of bundlers by tapping into the network of more than 350,000 potential donors who supported the governor in his recall election and turning to entrepreneurs who've launched new businesses in the last five to 10 years.

"Our donor is not the tried and true Republican donor in New York City that's given to everybody since Reagan," said Anthony Scaramucci, who is the founder of investment firm SkyBridge Capital and is raising money for Walker. "We don't have the mercenary donor that's paying for past political favors."

Jon Hammes, founder of a health care consulting company in Wisconsin, will serve a national finance co-chairman for the campaign, along with Todd Ricketts, co-owner of the Chicago Cubs, according to a source familiar with the plans. The move combines a veteran campaign fundraiser -- Hammes has raised money previous Republican nominees, including Mitt Romney and Arizona Sen. John McCain -- with a big dollar donor who is still relatively new to the political fundraising scene. This will be Ricketts' first role within a presidential campaign.

Their goal is to build an army of bundlers like Genevieve Hillis, a 34-year-old lobbyist in Chicago for a health care equipment company. Hillis helped Walker raise money for his gubernatorial campaign and grew that network of supporters during his recall election. Now she's preparing to take on her biggest role yet in a presidential campaign, helping to bring in new donors and introduce Walker to potential high-dollar supporters he might not otherwise meet.

"I haven't encountered anybody that was a supporter in the recall that isn't going to be a supporter in the presidential," Hillis said, although she acknowledged fundraising for a candidate in a crowded presidential field is a different battle than raising money for a recall race outside of the normal campaign cycle.

Walker's team isn't above courting the moneyed donors other campaigns are chasing either. Hillis often speaks to potential donors who are drawn to Walker and might be inclined to give hundreds of thousands of dollars, but they are also being courted by the Bush campaign. Her pitch: Let me get you on the phone with the governor.

"Scott is willing to have very frank conversations," Hillis said. "He's willing to be educated on a subject and open to changing his mind. He's a reasonable person."

Walker's allies said they don't expect him to be among the most flush in the field this quarter. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is expected to raise a jaw-dropping sum for the quarter that ended June 30. Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and the super PAC supporting him claim to have raise nearly $50 million combined.

While the first reporting period is significant, members of Walker's team said they are focused on building a team of bundlers who can steadily broaden his financial base by pitching the governor's message to an ever-widening circle of new donors.

"I'm looking for the people, men or women, that are focused on being involved in the process aggressively," said Michael Morgan, 44 years old, who is raising money for Walker. "If that means raising thousands of dollars at the start, I'm happy with it. Hopefully that will graduate to tens of thousands of dollars."

Morgan is no stranger to political fundraising. He organized the finance operations for Sen. Mark Kirk's House and Senate bids and remains a staunch supporter of the Illinois Republican. But Morgan's upcoming stint as one of Walker's finance co-chairs in Illinois will be his most prominent role in a president campaign.

Walker's "testing-the-waters committee," a precursor to his official campaign, is asking bundlers to raise $27,000 by July 12th. Morgan said it took him just four days to surpass that goal. All of the early contributor were under the age of 50.

"It's been a good pace I would say," Morgan said of his fundraising efforts so far. "Now that the announcement is imminent there's a lot more interest."

Scott Walker plans post-announcement blitz, NH stops // Union Leader // Dan Tuohy – July 7, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, following his announcement July 13 in his state, will travel to Manchester and Portsmouth later that week, the Union Leader has learned.

The New Hampshire visit is part of an early state blitz.

Walker is one of the few big names yet to announce a presidential campaign for the Republican nomination. The likely candidate has telegraphed some of his key focus, such as a pitch as a Republican reformer and fiscal and social conservative.

Walker, who in mid-June created a "testing the waters" committee as a precursor to a presidential campaign launch, visited New Hampshire in March and April. He addressed a GOP grassroots training session in Concord in March, and he was one of the potential presidential hopefuls addressing the state GOP's "First in the Nation Leadership Summit" in Nashua in April.

He would become the 15th Republican candidate in the race. The other Republican yet to announce is Ohio Gov. John Kasich.

Scott Walker's Home Crowd Disadvantage // US News // Jamie Stiehm – July 7, 2015

Under the July sun, you may spot political squalls on the horizon of this green city's Lake Mendota. That's what you get when a Republican red governor runs for president in a state that usually breaks Democratic blue on the electoral map.

Whether that governor would actually carry his own state – with a fairly liberal, active electorate – in the general presidential election in 2016 is quite the parlor game.

Word's going door to door in this capital city that Gov. Scott Walker is officially running for president, with a launch planned on July 13. All the talk about him walking the walk to the White House is getting real now, here in the state where the Republican Party itself was founded in the 1850s: Wisconsin. This is also a state, by the way, where the Progressive Party has deep roots.

Walker plans to make political hay out of being the only Midwesterner in the Republican presidential field, now top-heavy with Southerners. "Midwest [is] key to Walker strategy," the Wisconsin State Journal noted. Riding his

Harley-Davidson (the company is headquartered in Milwaukee) is part of the plain folks image. Of course, if Ohio Gov. John Kasich jumps into the pool of contenders, that could change the Walker formula that starts with a strong early victory in next-door Iowa come the frigid chill of February. (Only a Midwesterner knows how bad it can be.)

But feelings about Walker are decidedly mixed here in the state capital, with some bitter memories of a movement to recall him that failed. Walker survived the challenge to his approach on collective bargaining with public employees. The victory made him a conservative media darling in the national spotlight a few years back. It also attracted checks from the conservative Koch brothers. Walker was subsequently re-elected governor, but his support in Wisconsin has been "waning" recently, according to the Wisconsin State Journal.

Here's the irony: The harder Walker runs to the right to cement his position as a conservative front-runner for his party's primary nomination, the less popular he is at home, even with Republican state lawmakers. A move to clamp down on the state's open-records law just went awry.The academic community of the University of Wisconsin is warily anticipating yet another showdown: Walker may (or may not) declare war on the traditional tenure system. That's sure to win him debating points and votes, but might hurt him here at home. Another weakness Walker will likely be forced to face: His 2010 campaign promise to create a ton of new jobs is falling flat in Wisconsin's sluggish economy.

Walker is not a guy people feel neutral about, a stand-out even in a polarized era. Curiously, his political idol is Ronald Reagan, yet he has none of the genial charm that helped Reagan voters cross political lines. As my dad, a Wisconsinite, observed, most politicians like to be liked, but not Walker. Indeed the governor seems to relish his unpopularity with the other side, refusing to moderate harsh opposition to reproductive rights and to same-sex marriage. And he's enraged University of Wisconsin supporters by suggesting budget cuts for the renowned research institution, while proposing the Milwaukee Bucks receive millions of public funds for a new professional basketball arena.

Here in bookish Madison, anyway, it balances out well: Many in the liberal professoriate love to hate Walker, and, by some law of political physics, he loves to be hated by them. The governor's mansion in Maple Bluff is on the other side of Lake Mendota from the university's colorful Memorial Union Terrace.

Lucky. But watch for squalls.

The magical, disappearing Scott Walker conversation // MSNBC // Steve Benen – July 7, 2015

The chief economist at the Heritage Foundation is itself an awkward title – the Republican think tank has moved away from its pretense of rigorous policy analysis – but the job belongs to Stephen Moore. Earlier this year, after Moore published a bizarre piece criticizing the Affordable Care Act, Paul Krugman described the conservative as "a guy who has a troubled relationship with facts."
Krugman added at the time, "I don't mean that he's a slick dissembler; I mean that [Moore] seems more or less unable to publish an article without filling it with howlers … in a way that ends up doing his cause a disservice."
This assessment came to mind last night, reading this New York Times report on a bizarre incident involving Moore and a leading Republican presidential candidate.
Last Wednesday, Stephen Moore, a scholar at the Heritage Foundation who is an outspoken supporter of an immigration overhaul, described a recent telephone call with Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, in which he said Mr. Walker had assured him he had not completely renounced his earlier support for a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants.
" 'I'm not going nativist, I'm pro-immigration,'" Mr. Walker said, according to Mr. Moore's account of the call to a reporter for The New York Times.
On Sunday, after three days of pressure from Mr. Walker's aides, Mr. Moore said that he had "misspoken" when recounting his call with Mr. Walker – and that the call had never actually taken place.
This one's a doozy, so let's back up for a moment and consider how we got to this point.
Scott Walker's position on immigration has been a garbled mess for months. The Republican governor used to be quite moderate on the issue, but as he moved closer to a national campaign, he quickly shifted to the far-right, even going so far as to attack legal immigration.
In private, however, Walker has hedged on his new-found posture, and in March, the Wisconsin governor reportedly told a New Hampshire audience – behind closed doors – that he supports a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants already in the United States.
Walker and his team denied the reports, but added little clarity to his actual position.
With this in mind, Moore, a reform proponent, told the New York Times last week that he had a recent phone conversation with Walker, and heard directly from the unannounced candidate that he was "not going nativist" and does not oppose immigration.
This, of course, raised questions anew within the GOP – is Walker saying one thing in private and something else in public? Is the governor simply pandering, offering half-hearted promises to the right on a key issue? Moore's on-the-record comments naturally reinforced fears within the party.
Which led to yesterday, when Moore reversed course entirely. It's not that he misunderstood Walker's comments, the Heritage Foundation economist said, it's that Moore now says he never even spoke to the governor about immigration at all.

Which version of the story is true is now anyone's guess. It's possible Team Walker pressured Moore to take this new line; it's possible Moore didn't have the conversation he claimed to have.
The GOP governor could help clear things up, at least a little, by taking a firm position and sticking to it, but for now, that's apparently asking too much. From last night's New York Times report: "So, what exactly is Mr. Walker's current position on immigration? Asked if he supported any path to citizenship or legal status for illegal immigrants, Mr. Walker's spokeswoman, AshLee Strong, did not directly respond."

Busted!: Walker Admits Role in Failed Governm ent Secrecy Rule // TPM // T ierney Sneed – July 7, 2015

After days of dodging questions about whether Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) was involved in a failed proposal to dismantle the state's open records law, the governor's office confirmed Tuesday that his office was involved in the measure.

"Legislative leaders let us know that they were interested in making changes to the open records law. In response, our staff provided input regarding these proposed changes," Laurel Patrick, the press secretary for the governor, said in an email to TPM.

"Our intent with these changes was to encourage a deliberative process with state agencies in developing policy and legislation. This allows for robust debate with state agencies and public employees over the merit of policies and proposed initiatives as they are being formed, while ensuring materials related to final proposals, as well as information related to external stakeholders seeking to influence public policy, would remain fully transparent."

The admission came shortly after Republican legislative leaders said Walker aides had been involved in writing the proposal, which would have removed certain communications and other legislative documents from under the scope of the state's transparency laws and would have permitted lawmakers not to comply with other kinds of public records requests.

The language was initially approved by a party-line vote in the legislature's Joint Finance Committee late Thursday evening before the holiday weekend, as part of a larger budget package known as Motion 999. As backlash began to mount, Walker, joined by top GOP state lawmakers, announced Saturday that the provisions would be dropped from the package.

Scrutiny continued, however, as to whether Walker was behind the measure, as he faces a lawsuit for refusing to turn over certain documents in a public records request.

Some Republican lawmakers in the state have continued to defend the effort, and say they will try to move alterations to public records law forward as standalone legislation that would go through the typical public review process, instead of attaching it to a budget bill.

"Our focus remains on ensuring open and accountable government and we encourage public debate and discussion of any potential future changes to the state's open records law," Patrick, the governor's spokeswoman, said in the email

KASICH

Kasich: Obama administration 'in love' with Iran deal // Fox News – July 7, 2015

Gov. John Kasich, R-Ohio, said on "Special Report with Bret Baier" Tuesday that the Obama administration's push for a nuclear deal with Iran shows "it's very dangerous to fall in love with your own idea."

"I think the administration has probably fallen in love with the fact that they want to get an agreement, and when people are hyperventilating and unable to get one, sometimes they go and they sign something that they shouldn't," said Kasich, who is expected to announce his intention to run for president in the upcoming weeks.

Negotiators from Iran, Britain, China, France, Germany, Russia and the United States meeting in Vienna did not meet their self-imposed deadline on Tuesday for an agreement on a deal to curb Iran's nuclear program. Sticking points in reaching an agreement include Iranian demands for the lifting of a U.N. arms embargo and ballistic missiles sanctions, a timeframe for U.S. and EU sanctions relief, and future Iranian nuclear research and development.

Kasich said that the Obama administration should be prepared to walk away from a bad deal, and cited the example of President Reagan's negotiations with the Soviet Union.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Just remember Reagan in Reykjavik where Gorbachev said, look, get rid of all nuclear weapons, and I remember Reagan getting back in the car and saying 'no, we're not gonna do that,'" Kasich said.

"So, you have to have the strength to walk away. The problem, Bret, with all of this is just listen to our Arab friends who say, 'listen, if you give the Iranians all this cash by lifting the sanctions, they're going to fund Hamas. They're going to fund Hezbollah' who is the enemy to the Arab nations that we have things in common with," Kasich said.

"So, I don't think it's a good agreement, I would leave the sanctions in place until I saw a determined change in what Iran is all about, so I think, I'm very concerned about this."

John Kasich Tries To Gin Up Interest In Presidential Bid // The Daily Caller // Alex Pappas – July 7, 2015

"I didn't anticipate this," Ohio Gov. John Kasich said Tuesday afternoon to the several dozen reporters waiting for him in the lobby of the Republican National Committee headquarters. "I thought it'd be three people here."

"Well, as you probably know, I'm going to have a big announcement on the 21st," Kasich said, teasing his expected entrance into the presidential race in a few weeks. "Anybody coming?"

"It could be about my political career. Or it could be that I'm going to Hollywood," the former congressman cracked. "We'll see."

For now, Kasich's biggest task is getting his poll numbers up.

As of this week, Kasich is polling at just one and two percent in most national polls, putting him in 13th place, according to the Real Clear Politics polling average. That's a problem for someone trying to position himself as a top-tier alternative to former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

The first nationally televised debate is set for next month in Ohio, but Fox News — Kasich's former employer — says only the Republicans who poll in the top 10 will be included in the showdown. (A b-team forum will be held for the Republicans who don't poll in the top 10 the same day as the debate).

Asked about whether's he concerned Donald Trump's recent popularity with voters will keep him off the debate stage, Kasich replied: "I'm not really thinking about it. I got other issues I got to think about."

"Let's not put carts before horses," he added. "I mean, we still have a month to go. We'll see what happens."

Pressed on whether he thinks he will get his poll numbers up and make it into the top-tier debate, he replied: "I don't make predictions. I left that to Muhammad Ali years ago."

Asked during the press conference by a reporter about Donald Trump's recent comments about illegal immigrants from Mexico, Kasich said: "Well, first of all, I don't really respond to anybody's comments."

But Kasich went on to say he doesn't agree with Trump's "characterization" because he's "a believer that the country needs to be unified, not divided."

"At least for the next couple weeks, I'd like to honor Reagan's 11th commandment about attacking fellow Republicans," he added.

Asked why he's getting in the race later than others, Kasich said he's been focused on Ohio.

"Ohio is a big state," he said. "It's a complicated state. It's a microcosm of the country. So I needed to take care of Ohio and continue to take care of Ohio before I worry about any national prominence or anything else."

A reporter asked Kasich about how he's been compared to Jon Huntsman, the former Republican governor who entered the 2012 race with much buzz only to perform poorly.

"I've never really studied his campaign, or frankly others," Kasich said. "It's not something I spend a lot of time on."

"I got John Weaver working with me," he said of Huntsman's former top campaign aide. "I just talked to him a few minutes ago. He was actually a big senior adviser to McCain. Last time I checked, he was the nominee a few election cycles ago."

Making his pitch, Kasich referenced his re-election in 2014. "I won 86 out of 88 counties, 63 percent of the women vote, 51 percent of union households in one of the largest victories in Ohio history. There must be something that

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I'm doing right there in order to do that in what's one of the most pivotal states."

Kasich also portrayed himself as someone who gets the struggles of regular people.

"I'm John Kasich," he said. "I'm not anybody else. I come from McKees Rocks. My father carried mail on his back. I've lived in a town where if the wind blew the wrong way, people found themselves out of work. And I think I understand the anxieties of people in this country, many of whom are middle class, who wonder if the American dream is over. And I don't believe that it is."

Added Kasich: "I've had a lot of blessings in my life. The Lord's been good to me. And I'm going to do my best to lead and to improve people's lives whether I sit in the White House or whether in the white house in Lanetta Avenue in Westerville Ohio in being governor."

Kasich said he is in town visiting former colleagues and for a meeting of his new steering committee of lawmakers and members of the business community this evening.

The governor said he brought his twin daughters along for the Washington trip too. "I've learned an awful lot about Snapchat."

Candidates Start Showing Their Cards // Bloomberg // Joshua Gallu - July 8, 2015

Ka-CHING! Some candidates and super-PACs just can't wait for the filing deadlines to share their good new$.

The 2016 presidential money race is starting to take shape and early indications are that the road ahead will be lined with bullion.

Among the candidates who have shared fundraising numbers, ahead of filing deadlines later this month at the Federal Election Commission, Hillary Clinton, not surprisingly, leads the Democratic field with her campaign and allied groups reporting a combined war chest of nearly $70 million. Even Bernie Sanders, who describes himself as an independent socialist, says he has already lined up $15 million, from primarily smaller donations, to wage his campaign.

In typical form, candidates with good news have come out touting their numbers ahead of the official July 15 reporting date. Ted Cruz, who critics said would have trouble finding well-heeled backers, is boasting a $51.2 million arsenal, most of which in super-PACs, which can accept unlimited amounts of money but can't coordinate directly with the campaign. The chart below outlines numbers reported by the candidates themselves, super-PACs that are explicitly allied with and validated by presidential campaigns and other groups, such as 501(c)4 organizations that raise money to help a favored candidate.

Now, all eyes are on Jeb Bush. According to Buzzfeed, Bush's Right to Rise super-PAC says it has already pulled in enough money to give his opponents "heart attacks.'"

Inside the GOP's Effort to Close the Campaign-Science Gap With Democrats // Bloomberg // Sasha Issenberg - July 8, 2015

A Republican group aims to emulate President Obama's campaigns by bringing rigorous testing to campaign tactics. One problem: Not enough Republican scientists.

This spring, the Cato Institute identified 600 Americans who read more than 20 books per year and made arrangements to send them each one more. The libertarian think tank split these readers into three groups. One group received a free copy of Ayn Rand's Atlas Shrugged, one got longtime Cato executive David Boaz's The Libertarian Mind, and one a book that Cato scholars considered a useful placebo to free-market doctrine: the Bible. After three months, six months, and 12 months, members of all three groups would be surveyed to see if the unsolicited books they had received could explain differential response rates to one question: Do you consider yourself a libertarian?

The Cato researcher behind the project explained to other members of a below-the-radar Republican group known as the Center for Strategic Initiatives, or CSI, that the 600 books were just part of a pilot test. If the design appeared to work properly, the experiment would be replicated on a larger scale: 12,000 books this time. "Political books have never been tested," says David Kirby, now a vice president and senior fellow at Cato. "Think tanks think that books persuade people. Do they?"

Very few other members of the CSI circle had ever used books as tools for changing minds. A range of political consultants and vendors, they tended to trade in more ephemeral modes of communication: television ads and robocalls, direct mail, digital ads, and door knocks. But they were there for the same reason that Kirby had been willing to entertain the perfidy of using Cato resources to question whether reading Ayn Rand actually led people to libertarianism—a willingness to take everything they thought they knew about what works in politics and hold it up to empirical investigation.

“We were disappointed in 2012 with how much money we spent and how little we had to show for it.”

David Kirby, vice president and senior fellow, Cato Institute
The mere existence of the CSI field experiments seminar represents the right’s most constructive engagement with the continued traumas of its loss in the 2012 Presidential race—not just the fact that it had lost, but that it didn’t know at the time it was losing, and even afterward was at a further loss to understand how or why it had done so. While many Republicans responded by conceding catch-phrase-ready deficiencies—a need to do more and better with Big Data or the Ground Game—others were willing to acknowledge that the underlying problem was the lack of a culture within the GOP to encourage innovation. For a small but significant share of the party’s electioneering class, however, any true reckoning with 2012 invites a deeper epistemological crisis about how to run smarter campaigns in the 21st century.

“We should not assume anything. Absolutely every aspect of the campaign, from the best way to knock on doors to the best way to broadcast television, should be tested,” says Blaise Hazelwood, a Republican voter-contact specialist who founded CSI. “This is the way I did it on this campaign that won, so this is the way we should do it on all campaigns,” Hazelwood says, mocking the prevailing sentiment of entrenched political consultants. “The test for them is whether they win or lose on election day. That cannot be a valid test.”

The conservative establishment has a long tradition of organized gatherings. First there were Paul Weyrich’s weekly “coalitions” lunches, held on Wednesdays when Congress was in session. Anti-tax activist Grover Norquist later claimed the breakfast slot that day, his sessions focused more on economic policy than social issues. Donors and journalists in New York started meeting one Monday per month for an hour and a half; after relocating to South Carolina, Monday Meeting founder Mallory Factor took the concept south with him, launching the Charleston Meeting. All these were devoted to ideological cohesion and legislative strategy, the matching of like-minded donors and politicians. They tended to reaffirm certainties, rather than challenge them.

The CSI circle has yet to fall into a reliable schedule, and its gatherings—which now take place roughly every six weeks or so at Cato’s Washington headquarters—already mark a very different mode of collaboration. There is not a politician in sight, or many brand-name operatives; few attendees appear to be over the age of 40. This sphere of political operatives and party hacks angling to remake Republican campaigns includes strategists and tacticians for many of the party’s top presidential candidates, along with staffers from the Republican National Committee and consultants attached to various elements of the Koch political network.

“I sense it’s one of the few places where the warring factions of the conservative side of the aisle play together in the same sandbox,” says Columbia University political scientist Don Green, who has advised the group since its launch. “You have people who are close to the Tea Party and people who are antagonistic towards the Tea Party, and they’re all trying to learn from the same research method.”

About 50 people responded to Hazelwood’s invitation to gather at Cato in early June and, arrayed before her that Thursday afternoon, at long tables in lecture-hall formation, the schisms of the Republican Party in the early days of the presidential campaign were unmistakable. One of the people she had invited to present research that day came from Deep Root Analytics, which former Florida Governor Jeb Bush's presidential campaign has hired to help target its television ads. Another presenter represented FLC Connect, a phone vendor that has worked for Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker and has close links to his campaign-in-waiting. A pair of analysts from Optimus consulting, now advising Florida Senator Marco Rubio, sat in the back of the room, not far from where the founders of Targeted Victory, the firm former Texas Governor Rick Perry has hired to handle digital advertising and media analytics, found seats after arriving a few minutes after the scheduled 3:30 start time. Hazelwood herself is a longtime advisor to Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal, through her firm Grassroots Consulting, and has since joined his allied super-PAC as a consultant. She began by reminding those in attendance of CSI’s one rule: What they were about to hear was off the record. “Ask questions like you usually do,” she said. “Attack our speakers, like sometimes happens.”

Hazelwood has been asking and answering some of the toughest questions in Republican politics for years. Shortly after the 2012 elections, she faced one from Sally Bradshaw: What did Republicans need to do to improve their electoral mechanics? A longtime adviser to Bush, Bradshaw was one of five party eminences who had been tapped by Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus to oversee the Growth and Opportunity Project, the postmortem report its authors were repeatedly instructed not to describe publicly as an “autopsy.”

Twelve years earlier, Hazelwood had been in a similar position when, as the RNC’s political director, she had organized what was known as the 72-Hour Task Force to fine-tune field operations that Karl Rove and other top advisers to President George W. Bush blamed for his unexpectedly narrow victory. Starting in 2001, Hazelwood deployed dozens of controlled tests in low-profile elections, usually with the goal of convincing party officials and activists that it was worth investing in the infrastructure to support volunteer-based voter contact. (Many of those tests were modeled on the types of field experiments conducted by social scientists, although not conducted to academic standards.)

Many Republicans credited the findings of the 72-Hour Task Force with helping Bush in his re-election, but after his victory, the culture that had incubated them withered away. When one of Green's protégés approached an official on the Indiana Republican Party's 2006 coordinated campaign asking if he could integrate experiments into the party's efforts, there was only one question that mattered: Was the political scientist "in the family"? That described a very specific qualification—having worked on one of the two Bush-Cheney campaigns—and it was not on David Nickerson's CV. Soon, though, Nickerson had a Ph.D. from Yale, then an associate professorship at Notre Dame, and then, in 2012, a title that had never before existed in the history of presidential politics: director of experiments at Obama for America.

Nickerson's trajectory confirmed the extent to which Obama-era Democratic operatives have scientized the project of electioneering. The party's ascendant young operatives—notably Robby Mook, Hillary Clinton's campaign manager—nearly all had formative experience working on voter contact (rather than strategizing communications or managing political relationships) in a period of technical transformation. They were conditioned to see every aspect of citizen behavior as potentially predictable through statistical modeling, and everything a campaign did to shape it as a potentially testable hypothesis. Meanwhile, the fractured remnants of the Bush-era Republican Party did not indulge such curiosity within its ranks, and when it did emerge, did little to channel it productively. "After 2004 the drive just left. It was no longer there—we no longer did the testing and we ended up where we ended up in 2012. We just kind of stopped," Hazelwood says. "It was terribly frustrating after 2012 to see what happened, and know we needed to get back to testing, and having that housed in one place to help all conservatives."

Hazelwood made the case to Bradshaw that the party should take the initiative in spurring such a cultural shift, albeit with a different objective than the one that had inspired the 72-Hour Task Force tests. "Back then we framed it completely differently. It was, 'We're getting back to grassroots and showing why grassroots works,'" Hazelwood explains. "Now it's about tests, and getting to test return on investment and how you measure efficiency and effectiveness." Hazelwood helped Bradshaw rewrite the task force report's section on "campaign mechanics" to offer its imprimatur for what had become her pet project. Republicans should "identify a team of strategists and funders to build a data analytics institute that can capture and distill best practices for communication to and targeting of specific voters," as the report put it. "Using the GOP's data, the data analytics institute would work to develop a specific set of tests for 2013 and 2014—tests on voter registration, persuasion, Get-Out-The-Vote, and voter mobilization—that will then be adopted into future programs to ensure that our voter contact and targeting dollars are spent on proven performance."

The report cautiously avoided suggesting that the RNC incubate or host such an institute itself. The national party was a subject of more distrust among conservative activists than it had been during the early Bush years, and after Citizens United even more political spending was being driven by groups that were legally forbidden from coordinating with the party or its candidates. Hazelwood found a model for such a "data analytics institute" in the organization that had paved Nickerson's way into Democratic campaigns after he was turned away by Indiana's Republicans. In 2007, similarly driven to self-examination by their inability to dislodge an incumbent president they assumed was beatable, a group of lefty operatives launched the Analyst Institute, to serve as a "clearinghouse for evidence-based best practices in progressive voter contact." To do so, they formalized a series of "geek lunches," held at the AFL-CIO, at which individual operatives and researchers presented the scattered experiments they had been running on their own, into a stand-alone entity. Since then, the Analyst Institute's work has transformed the techniques of Democratic campaigners in the Obama era, and eventually contracted to embed its analysts in the president's re-election effort in 2012. Hazelwood decided to structure her project similarly, as a for-profit consulting firm that could operate with little concern for ever turning a profit, a status that allows it to work with parties and campaigns as clients without being subject to disclosure laws itself. Hazelwood was transparent in her debt to the Analyst Institute, down to the unhelpfully abstract name.

She pitched her new effort to collaborators across the right, eager to take advantage of the oddball calendar of off-year elections to begin running tests. There was one in Massachusetts, where the American Crossroads super-PAC agreed to randomly assign its robocalls on behalf of Gabriel Gomez, a first-time candidate challenging Representative Ed Markey to replace John Kerry in the Senate. In Minneapolis's mayoral campaign that same year, Hazelwood worked with the pro-business Minnesota Jobs Coalition to test what type of messaging works best to boost a conservative candidate in a officially non-partisan race with a large fragmented field.

In parallel, Kirby was also digging more deeply into experiments. He had spent 2012 working at FreedomWorks, the well-funded conservative grassroots organization that had invested heavily in field activity designed to help elect a Republican president and a more conservative Congress. Kirby emerged from the experience resentful of the the confidence political professionals brought to their decisions about tactical approaches. "We were disappointed in 2012 with how much money we spent and how little we had to show for it," Kirby says. "I felt integrity-bound to ask whether we could do any better."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kirby was drawn to the experimental method as a tool for resolving that curiosity. He signed up for a brief summer course on randomized trials taught by Green, the Columbia political scientist recognized as his discipline's most prominent evangelist for field experiments as the only tool capable of truly disentangling cause and effect in campaigns. (Green's work recently gained broader attention when he was forced to retract a paper he had published in the journal Science, about the effectiveness of sending gay canvassers to advocate for same-sex marriage, amid accusations that his co-author Michael LaCour had falsified survey data.) Green was inspired by Kirby's enthusiasm, and—after years of finding growing interest in his methods from from labor unions, environmental advocates, and ACORN —the opportunity to see if conservative targets responded differently to political communication than liberal ones. "Almost all the research to date has been on the left or center-left. Very little of it has been on the center-right or right," Green says. "There isn't a base of knowledge about the message, the messenger, and the audience they care about."

Kirby was interested in starting with lawn signs. "It is the most elemental political tactic," he says. "At FreedomWorks we spent probably at least a million dollars on that—hundreds and thousands of yard signs." Yard signs were often held up as an example of wasteful and pointless campaign spending ("yard signs don't vote" is a frequent refrain of the bien pensant political class), although there was little empirical evidence to sustain that skepticism. The limited research literature could be attributed partly to methodological complications—it is not easy to control for the spillover effects of, say, voters who drive past signs in a precinct other than the one in which they vote—but some stemmed from a lack of obvious incentive for political professionals to run an experiment. "In the case of lawn signs, what's odd is if you're dealing with a person who is deeply skeptical, they're not interested enough to do a test," says Green. "People working in low-salience races see them as their one and only affordable tactic and don't want to take out a control group."

Working with Green, Kirby ran an experiment in which Virginia precincts were isolated and then randomly assigned to have signs placed at a certain density in road medians, each of them photographed and geotagged so it would be possible to monitor whether they were removed by opponents or vandals. The signs had little impact on election results in those precincts, they believe—"maybe a glimmer of an effect" on both turnout and vote share, according to Green—but given how cheap signs are to print and place, the experimenters thought that they might have demonstrated that signs might not be a total waste after all.

Kirby became an enthusiastic booster of Hazelwood's project. After he went to work at the Cato Institute in early 2014, he offered one of the think tank's large conference rooms to host the right's version of the "geek lunch." The first CSI meeting, in late 2013, drew more than 100 people from across conservative politics. "It was the right moment," says Kirby. "People were curious." Green led a three-hour introduction to the experimental method, and encouraged attendees to think of it as a tool for assessing the effectiveness of their current tactics and auditioning new ones. Many of the experiments that attendees concocted in response—to test direct mail and phone calls in relation to turnout—addressed research questions that some lefty groups felt they had settled through replication as much as a decade earlier. "It wasn't breaking any new ground," Kirby says, "but at least it was getting the muscles flexing."

Within the CSI circle, there is resignation that one cultural problem Republicans face modernizing their campaigns remains beyond their immediate control: Academic social scientists capable of designing, administering, and analyzing field experiments are overwhelmingly on the Democratic side. For his part, Green—with his politically catholic view toward experimentation and promiscuous search for collaborators who will let him test scientific theories in the real world—remained something of a unicorn. "The left enjoys a lot of sympathetic academics and legions of ideologically aligned grad students that we on the right just won't have the same level of access to," says Brian Stobie, a former official at the Charles Koch Institute who attempted to recruit academic collaborators to test the Koch network's election-year operations before leaving to start his own firm. (One political scientist approached for this article did not want to acknowledge on the record any openness of graduate students to partner with conservative organizations on research projects, for fear of causing the graduate students reputational damage.)

The emergence of the CSI circle has also unmasked a generational divide more fundamental than the one between practitioners of online and offline politicking that defines most press coverage of the Republicans' technology predicament. There is a Web-savvy new guard that chafes against the old-line consultants who continue to profit from spending on television, phone, and mail. But these disputes—about the percentage of a campaign budget devoted to Web and mobile advertising, or whether a digital consultant has a proverbial "seat at the table" on strategic decisions—are lost on the CSI crowd, who have a scientific bent. Many there are eager to take on the digital consultants and the grandiose claims some of the digital people make, unchallenged, about their potential impact on elections. Those in the experimental set pronounce themselves agnostic about tactics, interested only in those whose worth have been proven, empirically. What can be measured to deliver votes—rather than just clicks or eyeballs—and at what cost?

Last May, strategist Dave Carney demonstrated for the CSI seminar what such skepticism could look like when put into practice. He and University of Texas political scientist Daron Shaw had come to present findings from a complicated series of experiments that Carney had invited Shaw to conduct within the gubernatorial campaign of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Texas Attorney General Greg Abbott. (The two had worked together on Perry's 2006 re-election, when Shaw and Green served on a team of in-house experimenters that Carney named his "eggheads," a collaboration that has produced more peer-reviewed papers than any other campaign in history.) Shaw could have merely presented his findings in the form of charts and graphs, but that would not have fully satisfied Carney's preference for dramatic colloquy. He invited the consultants and vendors whose services he had audited to be part of the discussion—an equivalent of beauty-pageant contestants being forced to stand on stage while judges render a verdict on their presence and poise.

Shaw had randomized the delivery of $1.6 million worth of campaign communications—across broadcast and cable television, a variety of digital formats, radio, and direct mail—with effects measured at both individual and neighborhood units. Three entire media markets, including El Paso and Amarillo, were assigned to a control group that received no Abbott campaign communication over the course of that month. Unlike many studies, Carney had begun by asking Abbott's consultants to devise plans at a budget that would "allow them to do what they needed to in order to produce an impact." "One of the most common criticisms one hears from practitioners about political science experiments is that the treatment is 'not what we'd do in a real campaign,'" Shaw explained. "The obvious solution is to give the professionals the resources and discretion to design and implement their preferred outreach within the context of the experiment."

Comparing polls conducted before and after the experiment, Shaw explained to the CSI seminar that three weeks of campaigning increased Abbott's popularity by nearly eight points among the voters he was trying to persuade, with targeted broadcast television buys doing so with the greatest force. At the same time, voters in zip codes served Facebook and online pre-roll video ads were less likely to support Abbott afterward, and turned out at the same rate as those who lived in areas that never received the ads. (Shaw did find that, in some combinations, Internet advertising did have a modestly positive impact on turnout, according to voter-registration records updated after the primary.) Digital consultants "might argue that the relatively modest effects associated with online outreach in our tests still constitute a more cost-effective investment than broadcast television," Shaw acknowledged in an article, which, as part of his deal with Abbott's campaign, he has submitted to political-science journals for publication.

His presentation of "The Abbott Campaign Experiments: Persuasion and Turnout in Texas" wowed the CSI seminar, as much for its ambition and audacity as any specific finding. But to the disappointment of many attendees, few other consultants expressed an interest in mimicking Carney's adventurousness. "Testing, whether done on the right or left, tends to show that the majority of what you think 'works' doesn't," says Stobie, who after the 2012 election launched 0ptimus Consulting to conduct experiments with the promise of helping clients to constrain their spending. "To the majority of operatives and organizations, paying for the opportunity to find out much of what you are doing is ineffective is not an appealing investment."

A few weeks ago, Hazelwood met Priebus for lunch at the Capitol Hill Club and handed over the results of an experimental study he had commissioned from her firm. Hazelwood's reputation had impressed Priebus long before the two first met, in 2009, back when he was a lawyer who oversaw field offices near his Wisconsin home and had "done every yard-sign job in the party you can imagine." Sharing a ticket with Bush in 2004 during a failed state Senate run, Priebus saw how, by "dividing states into turf, and measuring outcomes and metrics," as he puts it, Hazelwood's internal reforms had modernized the party's approach to field organizing. "I've known her as the author of that concept," Priebus says. "I really do understand the ground game and what we need to do."

The 72-Hour Task Force had been established to convince local party activists like Priebus that the ground game was not merely something one did or didn't do—that some tactical approaches to it were superior to others. Hazelwood had isolated "precinct organizing" (assigning a full-time field staffer for a month), "GOP flushing" (indiscriminately turning out Republican voters in the last two days before an election), and "volunteer calling" (compared to paid call centers) as three distinct activities, and subjected each to separate tests. As a result of the impact—two to three percentage points increase in turnout for each, they found—the Task Force prescribed that Republican campaigns assign one person to be individually responsible for every 40 to 100 voters. "Back to People Power," an internal RNC presentation titled the recommendation at the time .

After Bush's re-election, the party let much of that field infrastructure wither, along with the ethos behind and intellectual justification for it. During the years since, experiments have revealed a cognitive logic for understanding what mobilizes voters. Basic interactions immediately became more potent when they were personalized in a way that introduced a sense of individual responsibility around voting. Campaigns now frequently remind citizens of their past history casting a ballot, and recruit them to sign pledges to do so again. (One of Green's most famous tests, conducted with his former Yale colleague Alan Gerber, sent voters a copy of their past registration records with a threat to publicize a set after an election, so others could see whether or not they voted. It proved the most effective get-out-the-vote technique ever measured.) The behavioral psychology behind such techniques gave new depth to campaigns' understanding of "people power."

Hazelwood developed a hypothesis that people power could learn something from stalking. Campaigns have long thought of voter contact as part of a narrative progression: a flight of six direct-mail pieces over which a candidate's argument unfurls, or a "layered" approach in which phone calls and door-knocks are delivered in a deliberately choreographed sequence. But campaigns rarely share these plans with voters, often preferring to let the interactions speak for themselves and not draw undue attention to their volume. Instead, Hazelwood thought it was time to mash up the various tactics that the 72-Hour Task Force had segregated into distinct programs. Just as the pledges and the vote-history techniques had, walking voters through the process as it was happening could produce a personal engagement with the election.

Hazelwood was anxious that the party not let a busy midterm election year pass without using every opportunity to hone tactics it could deploy in earnest in 2016. After San Diego announced a special mayoral election, scheduled for February 2014, Hazelwood convinced a friend managing Republican Kevin Faulconer's ultimately succesful campaign to let CSI get involved. Hazelwood took command of some of the party's field programs there, randomly assigning some areas to receive specialized attention from local precinct captains. When she was able to show that her tactics had increased turnout by 8.5 percent among the party's so-called "low-propensity voters," the party's chairman took notice.

That finding intersected neatly with what Priebus had identified as his party's strategic challenge, and one of the areas the Growth and Opportunity Project had blamed for the party's inability to win the presidency or the Senate in 2012. "We're a really good midterm party, but for some reason presidential-year-only voters have been trouble for us," Priebus says. "If we put people out in the field—and we have a limited amount of people and limited amount of time—what's the combination of things we can do that have the best effect of turning out people who vote only in presidential years?"

Over the summer, Priebus signed off on Hazelwood's proposal to have CSI help answer that question. He was insistent that Hazelwood's experiments not interfere with the party's plans to spend $105 million across key races in mitdterm battlegrounds. In three states, however, Hazelwood's firm was permitted to layer atop the party's extant organization an additional precinct program that would target the type of low-propensity voters that Republican strategists did not expect to necessarily vote in 2014, but knew they needed to mobilize in 2016. After working with Hazelwood on how to structure her study, Green directed her to enlist Oklahoma State University professor Brandon Lenoir, whom he had guided on another lawn-sign experiment, for help implementing it. (There is such entrenched skepticism about yard signs that Green has waited to publish until he has five experiments, each conducted in distinct geographical and political contexts, that can be assembled into a single paper with more comprehensive findings than Kirby's alone.)

In nine counties across Colorado, Iowa, and Arkansas, Hazelwood's team worked with the state parties and the Republican Senate candidate to hire dedicated local organizers it called "precinct captains." Each was given a list of voters who had cast a ballot in one or fewer of the past four major elections, with directions to visit each voter in mid-October for an introductory conversation. "I was designated your Precinct Captain for the Republican Party, for the duration of the election," the canvassing script instructed. Then, over the next few weeks, the precinct captain would make contact four more times, in a specific order: again at the door, then by phone, followed by a postcard, and a then final door visit. If the voter was home each time, it meant a recurring interaction with an increasingly familiar neighborhood figure.

If the voter didn't answer the door or phone, however, the precinct captain was instructed to make the missed encounter just as personally memorable. Each door hanger left behind should have a handwritten Post-it note attached to it, with a message that the "personalized note instructions" recommended should say: "Hi Mary, sorry I missed you today! … I will be back in the neighborhood again next week and try to catch you then." The postcard would pick up the theme: "I have stopped by your house a couple times and tried to call to make sure you have all the information you need to vote." For a voter who wasn't home after two door visits and a phone call, the next note would turn even more ominous: "I will keep checking the list to see if you have voted and if not will drop by your house again to follow up."

Over the course of three weeks, Hazelwood's "stalker test" deployed some of the most potent psychological tricks known to nudge a citizen into the act of voting—along with some new ones—all as part of a borderline-creepy courtship that would be difficult to ignore. After the election, in which Republicans won the Senate races in all three of those states, Green and Lenoir found that it had a considerable impact, increasing turnout among targets by between two and three percentage points. It had not been easy, though, as stalking demanded attention, resources, and planning that campaigns cannot always muster for their field programs (The report did not calculate the cost of such contact, and it is certainly conceivable that at a much lower price yard signs could prove more cost-effective—if less targetable—than the elaborate program that required the same field staffer to be available for every interaction with an assigned voter.)

When Hazelwood presented the analysis to Priebus at the Capitol Hill Club, she put the paper that Green and Lenoir had written into a thick, glossy brochure with far more elaborate graphics than are typically packaged with academic articles. Priebus says the findings confirm what he had assumed about the value of localized field programs that focus on sustained personal contact, but now "I can take that information and go sell it to the state parties, and go to into a boardroom to get people to cut a check."

The finding that most excited both Hazelwood and Priebus, however, grew out of an accident. In Colorado, canvassers were mistakenly assigned to go to some of the party's reliable voters, who had cast ballots in all four of the most recent elections. After being hounded by a precinct captain, they voted at a lower rate than those who received no contact at all. "We have a proven fact now that we should stop calling these people," Hazelwood says, with comic impatience. "Stop wasting time!"

Republicans have won the battle over money in politics. Should anyone celebrate? // WaPo // Paul Waldman – July 7, 2015

As the candidates for president have begun announcing their second-quarter fundraising hauls, a couple of things have become apparent. First, there is a huge amount of money flowing into the campaign, even to some second-tier candidates. And second, the campaign finance system is a joke.

As we now approach the anything-goes situation that Republicans have been advocating for years, it's time to ask: Is this how we want things to work?

Republicans in particular should be asked that question, because they're the ones who created this state of affairs and promised that it would be good for everyone. Here are some of its characteristics: There will almost certainly be more money spent in this election than ever before. A number of candidates have one billionaire benefactor promising to bankroll their campaigns. The Federal Election Commission, deadlocked between its Democratic and Republican members, has essentially stopped enforcing campaign finance laws. The Internal Revenue Service has also all but given up enforcing the laws that govern tax-exempt nonprofits and their political activities.

The campaigns are hauling in the cash. On Monday, Ted Cruz announced that his campaign had $51 million dollars behind it, which included $37 million raised by pro-Cruz super PACs — so they're not even pretending that the "independent" groups are anything but an arm of the Cruz campaign. Hillary Clinton has raised $45 million just since April, and we're waiting to hear whether the Jeb Bush super PAC Right to Rise met its $100 million goal.

This is all enabled by the fact that although campaigns and super PACs are prohibited from "coordinating" with each other, what counts as coordination has become so limited that it's little more than a speed bump for campaigns and super PACs that are working together. They have nothing to fear from the FEC, where Republicans always appoint commissioners who barely believe there ought to be any regulation of campaign finance at all, and have successfully ground enforcement to a halt. The agency has gone two years without anyone leading its legal office, and its own chairwoman says: "The likelihood of the laws being enforced is slim."

The situation at the IRS, which has jurisdiction over nonprofit groups and their involvement in politics, is virtually the same. Because of the "scandal" that came to light in 2013, which involved extra scrutiny given to political groups applying for tax-exempt status as 501(c)(4) "social welfare" organizations, the agency came under withering attack from Republicans and has shrunk back from enforcing the law. Despite a new wave of secret donations going to phony social welfare organizations established by candidates to boost their campaigns, the IRS has essentially surrendered, as the New York Times reports:

As presidential candidates find new ways to exploit secret donations from tax-exempt groups, hobbled regulators at the Internal Revenue Service appear certain to delay trying to curb widespread abuses at nonprofits until after the 2016 election.

We should take a moment to remember what the IRS scandal was actually about. It wasn't, as so many conservatives believe, a story of a nefarious White House-directed conspiracy to persecute Barack Obama's enemies. In reality, there were a bunch of inadequately trained IRS employees attempting to apply a vaguely-worded law in the face of a dramatic increase in the number of applications they had to process after the 2010 Citizens United decision threw open the doors of campaign finance.

And the groups that suffered the horrific injury of having their 501(c)(4) applications take longer to process than they should have? Let's not forget that they were, in fact, violating the spirit of the law. Without question. That's true of both the conservative and liberal groups who got extra scrutiny, which they absolutely deserved, because they were plainly political groups masquerading as social welfare organizations.

But now it's open season, and most of the presidential candidates have established 501(c)(4) organizations that are allowed to shield their donors' identity from public scrutiny while operating as an arm of the campaign. Marco Rubio's (c)(4), the Conservative Solutions Project, has already raised $15.8 million for him.

So that's where we are — limitless donations from the wealthy and corporations to super PACs and (c)(4)s that coordinate with campaigns, billionaires buying more influence than ever, and crippled government agencies unable to enforce the frayed laws that still exist. To which Republicans say, "That's great!"

Which isn't surprising, given that this was the system they engineered. They filed lawsuit after lawsuit in a (largely successful) attempt to get the Supreme Court to gut the campaign finance laws that had been in place for decades, opening up the system to more money — while they also files suits challenging every attempt at public financing in any form that might level the playing field. They threw sand in the FEC's gears and bludgeoned the IRS into submission. And they did it all on the assumption that the more money that pours into campaigns and the less accountability there is, the more partisan advantage they'll gain.

Which might or might not be true — after all, it isn't as though Democratic politicians like Obama and Clinton have had too much trouble exploiting the system and raising spectacular amounts of money themselves. But we've now just about reached the campaign finance nirvana Republicans had been working toward for so long.

So how's it working out? Is there anyone who could argue that this is the best of all possible systems? Is there someone who'll say that the American public benefits when billionaires summon presidential candidates to grovel before them in attempt to secure their patronage? Is there a single person who'll honestly say, "Yes, this is exactly how campaigns ought to work"? Can anybody make the case that this will produce a more democratic system that helps the government solve problems and secure progress for the public?

'Super PACs' Take On New Role, Organizing Voters // NYT // Trip Gabriel – July 7, 2015

College students supporting Rand Paul for president were out in force going door to door in this university town recently, using their iPad Minis to help identify Republicans committed to voting for the Kentucky senator in next year's Iowa caucuses.

And when Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana visited the state the same week in June for town hall-style meetings in Waukee, Council Bluffs and Sioux City, his supporters collected voters' names and emails with an eye toward caucus day.

But the Paul and Jindal campaigns were not behind these time-honored grass-roots organizing efforts. Instead, in a twist that shows how even retail politics is being transformed by a flood of loosely regulated big money, the two candidates' courtship of voters is being carried out by "super PACs," which are using their abundant war chests to move into the nuts and bolts of campaign operations.

In previous election cycles, super PACs — which can raise unlimited donations from corporations and individuals alike — largely channeled money from wealthy donors into political advertising. But now they are branching out into what had seemed a fundamental function of a campaign committee: organizing voters one at a time.

The 2016 race could be the most expensive in history, in part because of spending by "super PACs." Legally, the groups cannot coordinate with candidates, but there is plenty of wiggle room. By Aaron Byrd and Emily B. Hager on Publish Date July 7, 2015.
Candidates "are pushing as much of the stuff as they can over to the super PACs because that's where the real money is," said Terry Giles, who recently quit as campaign manager for Ben Carson, the retired neurosurgeon, to start a new super PAC that will support him.

The practice of having super PACS, which can be entirely financed by a single billionaire, take over such operations allows campaigns, which may raise only $2,700 from any one donor, to outsource the costly, labor-intensive work of recruiting activists and building lists of supporters.

It could also allow second-tier candidates to be more competitive, prolonging the nominating process. And in the general election, a Republican nominee whose organizing is paid for by a super PAC might level the playing field with Democrats, whose allies in labor have traditionally given the party an edge in mustering volunteers to help turn out voters.

But there are risks to outsourcing a field campaign. Candidates, who are legally forbidden to coordinate with super PACs, are in danger of being cut off from their most ardent supporters as they head into caucus and primary elections.

"As a campaign, you have absolutely no idea" how you're doing, said Nick Ryan, president of a super PAC supporting Mike Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor. "That would scare me to death. You'd be disconnected from the very base of your campaign, the people who are most passionate about you." (Still, Mr. Ryan hesitated to rule out any grass-roots campaign work aside from recruiting volunteers to support Mr. Huckabee.)

Tina Goff, who recruited leaders in all 99 Iowa counties on behalf of a super PAC supporting Ben Carson before he even declared his candidacy, turned down an offer of a job with his campaign. "It would have been great to travel around with Dr. Carson," she said, "but I felt like I had created an infrastructure here and I wanted to continue what I was doing." She said she was now hiring 25 people to knock on doors in Iowa after paying $40,000 for a list of Republican caucusgoers from the state party.

Even for candidates who do not have fund-raising problems, relying on super PACs offers another way to manage expectations and perceptions.

In Iowa, where Jeb Bush faces stiff resistance from conservatives, a senior Republican strategist said that before Mr. Bush announced his candidacy, his team discussed leaving some of the field organizing to a super PAC established by his aides. That would spare Mr. Bush's campaign some embarrassment should he perform badly in Iowa during the caucuses by giving his campaign distance from the effort.

Several campaigns have welcomed outside organizing efforts in Iowa, which will hold the first nominating contest on Feb. 1. The farthest along are efforts for Mr. Paul, Carly Fiorina and Mr. Carson.

An outside group that supports Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, who is expected to announce his candidacy next week, collected cards at a recent political forum in Des Moines from voters pledging to caucus for the candidate. A spokesman for the group, Our American Revival, said it would continue to organize on Mr. Walker's behalf in Iowa and other states.

So far, only super PACs supporting Republicans appear to be organizing the grass roots, although outside groups that back Democrats, including labor unions and nonprofits, have long performed tasks like registering voters and canvassing neighborhoods. (A super PAC aimed at generating grass-roots support for Hillary Rodham Clinton, Ready for Hillary, closed up shop once Mrs. Clinton formally entered the race.)

"It's no surprise that super PACs would at some point evolve into the organizational side of politics," said Chris LaCivita, a senior adviser to Mr. Paul. He called it a predictable outgrowth of an era that since 2002 has banned unlimited donations to party committees, and in which wealthy donors have rechanneled support to outside groups, which are less accountable.

Ms. Fiorina, the former chief executive of Hewlett-Packard, may have turned over more traditional campaign tasks to a super PAC than any other candidate: lining up endorsements, answering reporters' questions about her business career and opening field offices in early primary states like South Carolina. The primary reason is her difficulty raising money for a full-fledged campaign. She reported pulling in just $1.4 million in May and June.

The super PAC, Carly for America, which said Monday that it had raised $3.4 million, "is running a grass-roots organization focused on building support in early states," said Katie Hughes, a spokeswoman.

The group organizing for Mr. Paul, Concerned American Voters, has pledges of "multiple millions" from wealthy donors in Silicon Valley, said Jeff Frazee, its president. It has had 40 full-time field staffers in Iowa since June 1, knocking on doors during the day and making phone calls at night.

But that effort illustrates the potential for duplication and clashing agendas between super PACs and campaigns. Mr. Paul already had a network of activists in Iowa, many of whom supported campaigns by his father, Ron Paul. Asked about the super PAC, the campaign's state director, Steve Grubbs, said in a text message: "Not commenting on this. Wish I could."

That was because the donors were talking among themselves about shifting support from TV advertising, the focus of America's Liberty PAC, to a grass-roots campaign.

"I'm not convinced that TV ads are really as effective as they were," said Mr. Banister, an early investor in PayPal, adding that interactive communication with voters mattered more. "Grass roots is just kind of old-school interactive," he said.

Mr. Frazee, the Paul backer, said he was inspired by Barack Obama's upset victory over Mrs. Clinton in Iowa eight years ago. "He was able to win with a very organized ground game," he said. "That's been our strategy."

In Iowa City, Ani DeGroot, a college student on summer break working for Concerned American Voters, approached Timothy Anderson, who was mowing his lawn.

"Will you support Rand Paul?" she asked after he had shut down the mower.

"I probably will," he said.

"Fantastic," Ms. DeGroot said. "Are there any issues that are most important to you?"

"I wish we would just get out of all these wars and being policemen to the world," said Mr. Anderson, a human resources manager.

Ms. DeGroot entered his responses into her iPad Mini supplied by the super PAC. At a future date, another Paul supporter might call on Mr. Anderson to urge him to volunteer, or even to speak for Mr. Paul at his precinct

Puerto Rican debt crisis forces its way onto presidential political agenda // WaPo // Steven Mufson - July 8, 2015

Q: Which place has as many Republican delegates as New Hampshire, plus enough native sons and daughters living in Florida to swing the outcome of that state's presidential primaries or even the general election?

A: Puerto Rico.

That political reality has put the financially ailing U.S. territory on the map of presidential hopefuls, who are being asked what, if anything, the federal government should do to help engineer a rescue plan for the debt-strapped island.

Politically, much is at stake. Puerto Rico has its own voice at nominating conventions, with more delegates at the Democratic Convention than 21 states. And 1 million Puerto Ricans live in Florida, enough to be the swing vote in one of the nation's most important swing states.

At the current pace of migration, triple the rate just a few years ago, the number of people of Puerto Rican origin in Florida could soon exceed the number of Cuban Americans in the state. Along Interstate 4 between Orlando and Tampa in central Florida, Puerto Rican Americans are everywhere, comprising more than a quarter of the population of Florida's Osceola County.

As a result, presidential candidates are being pressed to voice support for Puerto Rico in its hour of economic need and back the use of bankruptcy law to help the territory, which is teetering on the edge of default, to reduce and manage its $73 billion in debt. While the bankruptcy code can be used by states for the orderly court-supervised reorganization of cities, municipalities, municipal utilities or school districts, Congress in 1984 altered the law to bar the commonwealth of Puerto Rico or any of its utilities, towns or school districts from being able to turn to the bankruptcy code in a crisis.

"Those who want the support of Puerto Ricans must help Puerto Rico now. Not later." Puerto Rico Gov. Alejandro García Padilla said in an interview Sunday on Telemundo. He added, "They need to act now, not in a few months during the elections."

García Padilla said "there are some people who have been a little passive, and they are the candidates for president of the United States. Both the Democrats and the Republicans, especially in Florida, because as you know, it's a battleground state and it's important."

And the Puerto Rican vote is up for grabs, both in Florida and the territory. Six Americans of Puerto Rican descent have been elected to the Florida state legislature — three Republicans and three Democrats. In Puerto Rico, the current governor, García Padilla, who narrowly won election, calls himself a friend of President Obama's. The previous governor, Luis G. Fortuño, resembled a Reagan Republican.

"During the last campaign, it was called the swing vote of the swing state," said Jeffrey Farrow, chairman of the Oliver Group, a public policy communications firm, and a former White House adviser on Puerto Rico under Presidents Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton.

A poll by Latino Decisions, a firm that does polling and analysis of Latino voters, showed that Puerto Rican voters in Florida went 72 percent to 28 percent for Obama over Mitt Romney in 2012, while Cuban American voters in the state chose Romney over Obama by 64 percent to 35 percent.

Yet Farrow said that while "there is a perception that Puerto Ricans are Democratic voters, that is not necessarily the case in Florida. The more recent poll data shows they identify more with Democrats than Republicans, but they are socially conservative. They voted for Jeb Bush for governor."

"During my race, I said I would slash government expenses," said Fortuño, now a partner at Steptoe & Johnson, a Washington-based law firm. "Often on radio talk shows, people would say they have a daughter who needs a job, and I'd say she would not have a job in government, and my advisers would go nuts. And I won. So it's very doable."

Jeb Bush has been courting the Puerto Rican vote for a long time. In 1980, he spent more than two months organizing the campaign of his father, George H.W. Bush, who handily won the primary that year. Jeb Bush delivered speeches in Spanish at more than 75 gatherings. When he campaigned to be governor of Florida, he went to Puerto Rican church fiestas.

"I think statehood is the best path, personally. I've believed that for a long, long while," Jeb Bush said during a visit to the territory in April, recalling his father's long-ago campaign. "Nothing makes me believe that that position should change. To get the full benefits and responsibilities of citizenship, being a state is the only path to make that happen." He said: "I think the next president, whoever that person is, should use their influence to make sure Congress acts on this and that this should be a question of self-determination. . . . That's just a question of principle and, you know, morality, I think. It's not a question of politics."

Bush, while campaigning in Puerto Rico in April and again in South Carolina last week, also came out in support of granting Puerto Rico the option of using Chapter 9 of the bankruptcy code to restructure its debts. "Puerto Rico should be given the same rights as the states," Bush said in Spanish before a small crowd at the Universidad Metropolitana in San Juan.

Bush's Republican rivals have been, by and large, more cautious for fear that extending Chapter 9 to Puerto Rico could look like a bailout of the island — even though bankruptcy extracts concessions from bondholders and requires no federal money.

"Senator [Marco] Rubio has been closely watching events in Puerto Rico and is concerned about the economic situation there," spokeswoman Brooke Sammon told The Washington Post by e-mail over the weekend. "He's in the process of reviewing the legislation to make sure it is the right approach to begin addressing Puerto Rico's debt crisis without having any negative impact on American taxpayers."

Donald Trump — whose heavily indebted corporate affiliates have used bankruptcy to reorganize four times — has a unique perspective on Puerto Rico. He is also a partner with local construction tycoons Arturo and Jorge L. Diaz in the Trump International Golf Club, a resort east of San Juan that boasts two 18-hole courses. The Trump campaign did not respond to a request for comment.

In a June 30 tweet, Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton did not address the bankruptcy issue but said that "Puerto Rico's debt crisis is not theirs alone. For PR's economy to grow & their people to thrive, they need real tools & real support."

But on Tuesday, Clinton said that Puerto Rican municipalities and state-owned enterprises should be allowed to use bankruptcy protections to overhaul their finances. "We're not talking about a bailout, we're talking about a fair shot at success," she said in a statement.

Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley (D), by contrast, jumped on the issue last week. "I am very concerned about the impending financial collapse of Puerto Rico," said O'Malley, who backed the use of the bankruptcy code and an equalization of Medicaid and Medicare benefits for the island's residents. "We must help our fellow U.S. citizens, not only because it's the right thing to do, but because our region's economic stability depends on it," he said.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) joined the discussion on Tuesday, backing bankruptcy protections to enable Puerto Rico to "restructure its debt in a rational way that does not harm its people, ordinary investors or pension funds in the United States." He blamed the island's debt crisis on "the policies of austerity and the greed of large financial institutions."

The flow of Puerto Ricans to Florida has altered the calculus of politics there. Whereas politicians once catered to the conservative, anti-Castro Cuban opinion that dominated the Latino vote, now the Cuban American consensus on Cuba has fractured and the Puerto Rican population has swelled.

That Puerto Rican electorate has its own concerns.

According to polling data gathered last November by Latino Decisions, Puerto Ricans support expanding Medicaid and raising the minimum wage more strongly than Cuban Americans do, although Cuban Americans also strongly endorse those policy proposals. Education also ranks higher as a concern among Puerto Ricans.

Yet despite Jeb Bush's efforts, the Latino Decisions poll in November showed that among Puerto Ricans in Florida, he was then getting a 42 percent "very unfavorable" rating and only 10 percent "very favorable."

Now the territory's economic plight might become a factor. And people in Florida keep track through readily available media from the island as well as locally.

"The Puerto Ricans living here are very, very strongly connected to the island," said Betsy Franceschini, who is Florida regional director of the Puerto Rico Federal Affairs Administration, an arm of the Puerto Rican government. "They do care even though they're here."

Franceschini operates her agency in a modest house in Kissimmee with two flagpoles, one for the Puerto Rican flag and one for the American. The agency provides advice to Puerto Ricans moving from the island to the Orlando-Tampa area. The previous governor, Fortuño, had closed the office. García Padilla, fulfilling a campaign promise he made during a visit to Orlando, reopened it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Franceschini said the key public-policy issues of concern to people who come to the office for help are the island's fiscal crisis, its desire to use the bankruptcy code to restructure municipal debts and unequal Medicare payments by the federal government. "Folks here are very upset about that and are organizing and mobilizing," she said, "and they want to know where the candidates stand."

Christie, Paul and Perry Court the Black Vote // WSJ // Jason Riley – July 7, 2015

President Obama will be leaving the White House in 18 months, but where will that leave the minority voters who helped elect him? It's a question that Republican presidential hopefuls not named Donald Trump are pondering.

Between 1980 and 2004, black support for the Democratic presidential candidates ranged from 83% to 90%. But in 2008 Mr. Obama won 95% of the black vote and was re-elected four years later with 93%. In 2012 black voters turned out at higher rates than white voters for the first time on record. The likelihood of Hillary Clinton or another Democratic nominee drawing Obama levels of black support is small. Many blacks may simply stay home. Others, having observed the black economic retrogression that occurred even with a black Democrat in the Oval Office, might consider alternatives.

To that end, Republicans such as New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul have been actively courting minorities. Mr. Christie has become a familiar presence in Camden, Newark and other economically depressed parts of the Garden State. In 2013 he was re-elected with the backing of 51% of Hispanics and 21% of blacks—an impressive 19-point and 12-point increase, respectively, from four years earlier.

Woody Allen once said that 80% of success is showing up, and Mr. Christie has been willing to campaign in communities and among voters that Republicans too often write off. The governor has bothered to introduce himself to black voters directly instead of letting Democratic opponents define him or only giving the occasional speech to the NAACP.

"How many Republicans are you going to see walking up and down these streets like this?" a black woman in Orange, N.J., told a Real Clear Politics reporter in 2013. "He's approachable. I really like that. And I think the people in Orange are really thrilled, whether they're Democrat or Republican, that he's here."

Mr. Paul, for his part, has courted younger blacks by visiting historically black college campuses, which is admirable. Less admirable is Mr. Paul's decision to mouth liberal positions on voter ID, drug laws and prison sentencing in order to win black support. "I'm trying to go out and say to African-Americans 'I want your vote, and the Republican Party wants your vote,' " he told a radio interviewer last year, explaining why he thinks the GOP should drop the voter ID issue. "We have to be aware that the perception is out there and be careful about not so overdoing something that we further alienate a block of people that we need to attract."

That's not black outreach—that's pandering. Moreover, it's off-base. A Fox News poll last year found majority support for voter ID laws among every demographic group, including 51% of blacks. A 2012 Pew survey put black support for voter ID at 62%. And law-abiding ghetto residents want the criminals who prey on them and their children locked up, not coddled. Don't confuse the agenda of civil-rights groups and other black elites with the desires of most blacks.

The better approach is the one taken by former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who launched his second bid for the White House last month and gave one of the campaign's most poignant speeches last week. Mr. Perry is less concerned with making race-based entreaties than he is with appealing to blacks as fellow Americans. Imagine that!

The governor acknowledged America's history of oppressing blacks—"and because slavery and segregation were sanctioned by government, there is a role for government policy in addressing their lasting effects"—but he also noted the tremendous progress that has been made.

"A half-century ago, Republicans and Democrats came together to finally enshrine in the law the principle that all of us—regardless of race, color or national origin—are created equal," said Mr. Perry. "When it comes to race, America is a better and more tolerant and more welcoming place than it has ever been." These may be plain truths, but such progress is regularly dismissed by many on the grievance-focused left, where there is money to be made by civil-rights groups, and votes to be had by Democratic politicians, who are willing to pretend that systemic racism still drives racial disparities in the U.S.

Mr. Perry believes that a more significant barrier to black progress is poor political representation. The Democratic Party has long operated with no fear of losing the black vote, and Republicans have been too quick to concede it. Mr. Perry's overarching theme, however, was a rebuke of identity politics, stressing instead what all Americans desire—safe neighborhoods, good schools, economic opportunity. And he urged black voters to compare the track records of liberal and conservative governance on those fronts and then hold politicians accountable.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"In the cities where the left-wing solutions have been tried over and over again—places like Detroit and Chicago and Baltimore—African-Americans are moving out," said the governor. "In blue-state coastal cities, you have strict zoning laws and environmental regulations that have prevented builders from expanding the housing supply." San Francisco's black population today is half of what it was in 1970. That's obviously not because conservatives run the place.

If the GOP is getting serious about competing for black voters, it's a welcome development for our political system. And if Republican presidential candidates are looking for the right approach, they could do a lot worse than Mr. Perry's template.

2016ers tiptoe around Puerto Rico's debt bomb // Politico // Daniel Strauss – July 7, 2015

With Puerto Rico asking the U.S. federal government for a lifeline to rescue it from crushing debt, some 2016 candidates see an opportunity – Florida votes.

Jeb Bush was first out of the gates. Back in April, as the island territory started careening toward a breaking point, he said Puerto Rico's public agencies should be able to file for bankruptcy.

But late last month, Puerto Rico Gov. Alejandro García Padilla announced that the commonwealth could not pay back its roughly $72 billion in debts, lending the question new urgency.

Democrats have urged Washington to help. On Tuesday, frontrunner Hillary Clinton called on Congress to allow Puerto Rico to restructure its debts under Chapter 9 of the Bankruptcy Code, the first step in what she called a "multifaceted" approach. Her top rival for the Democratic nomination, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, followed suit a few hours later. Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley had previously pressed President Barack Obama and Congress "to act to ensure that Puerto Rico is able to negotiate with its creditors."

But the rest of the 2016 field, including the other four senators running for president, has been conspicuously slower to take a position. Sens. Ted Cruz, Lindsey Graham, Rand Paul did not respond to questions on the issue. Sen. Marco Rubio's office said the Florida senator was still looking into it.

None were willing to throw their support behind a bill being offered up by Sens. Charles Schumer and Richard Blumenthal that would give Puerto Rico the same bankruptcy protection as municipalities across the rest of the United States.

Puerto Rico's debt crisis has the potential to affect the 2016 race — and nowhere more so than in Florida, with its growing Puerto Rican population of about 1 million people, a key constituency in a purple state with 29 electoral votes.

"This is a driver for their vote," said Resident Commissioner Pedro Pierluisi, Puerto Rico's representative on Capitol Hill. "Our votes are swing votes."

In the last two presidential elections, Puerto Rican votes boosted Obama in Florida, but could easily help Republicans this time around, former Puerto Rican governor Luis Fortuno said.

"They can sway," Fortuno, a conservative, said. "I believe other Republicans that want to compete effectively ought to be thinking about this, and they probably have to say something about it."

"I don't see how you get through the Florida primary without being asked," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former top economic adviser for Sen. John McCain's 2008 presidential bid.

But calling for federal intervention is not without political risks: No Republican presidential candidate wants to be tarred as pro-bailout.

While bankruptcy protection would not provide the island territory with direct financial support, it could still raise the hackles of creditors eager to toss around the "b" word in a bid to sap congressional momentum.

The issue is especially perilous for Rubio, who rode to office in 2010 on a wave of support from tea party voters vehemently opposed to government rescues of big banks and underwater homeowners.

So even though Rubio is locked with Bush in a zero-sum struggle with Bush for Florida primary votes, especially among Hispanics, he has been hesitant to weigh in.

"Senator Rubio has been closely watching events in Puerto Rico and is concerned about the economic situation there," Rubio spokeswoman Brooke Sammon told POLITICO. "He's in the process of reviewing the legislation to make sure it is the right approach to begin addressing Puerto Rico's debt crisis without having any negative impact on American taxpayers."

Pierluisi said it's understandable why Rubio and Ted Cruz, the other 2016 candidate of Cuban descent, have been so cautious.

"I know for a fact that both of them have been studying this issue and their staff have been getting their feet wet on this," Pierluisi said.

Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee has already previewed how the more conservative candidates might approach the issue.

"We've had enough bailouts. Puerto Rico is a commonwealth, not a state, and should not be allowed to file for Chapter 9 bankruptcy," Huckabee told POLITICO.

Even among the candidates who support allowing Puerto Rico to file for bankruptcy, there was a visible cautiousness about using the dreaded term.

"We're not talking about a bailout, we're talking about a fair shot at success," Clinton said in Tuesday's statement.

Jeb Bush, Hillary Clinton to share stage in Fort Lauderdale // Tampa Bay Times // Alex Leary – July 7, 2015

Jeb Bush will speak before the National Urban League Conference in Fort Lauderdale on July 31, illustrating his campaign's goal of broadening the GOP message.

Hillary Clinton is also addressing the group, as is Ben Carson and Martin O'Malley.

"The candidates will share their visions for saving our cities on Friday, July 31, during a session entitled 'Off To The Races: The 2016 Presidential Candidates' Plenary,' " according to a release.
"As we convene in Florida to deliberate solutions to the economic and social challenges our cities are facing, it's vital that those contending for the highest office in the land be part of that conversation," National Urban League President and CEO Marc H. Morial said.

The candidates' plenary will take place on the second full day of the Conference themed "Save Our Cities: Education, Jobs + Justice."

"Our focus was inspired by a year that saw little accountability for law enforcement responsible for killing unarmed Black men, teenagers and children; a continual assault on voting rights; widening economic inequality gaps; and an increasingly partisan education debate far more rooted in political agendas than in putting our children first," Morial said.

Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton support bankruptcy rights for Puerto Rico // CNN – July 7, 2015

Puerto Rico has $73 billion in debt that it says it can't repay. Now it has two very powerful allies on its side: Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton.

Both 2016 presidential candidates support giving Puerto Rico the same legal bankruptcy rights that states have. Puerto Rico's governor has been lobbying hard for that right.
There's a bill in Congress to give Puerto Rico what it wants, but it has no co-sponsors. That's why Bush and Clinton's backing could be key.

"I think that Puerto Rico ought to be treated as other states are treated as it relates to restructuring," Bush said during a visit to the island in late April. Other Republican candidates have largely stayed silent on the issue thus far.

On Tuesday, Clinton jumped on board as well.

"Congress should provide Puerto Rico the same authority that states already have to enable severely distressed government entities, including municipalities and public corporations, to restructure their debts," she said in a statement on her campaign website.

Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley has been a vocal supporter as well.

What it means: To be clear, no state can file for bankruptcy. But the 50 states do have the right to allow municipalities -- cities, towns and other local government entities -- within their states to file for bankruptcy.

Puerto Rican municipalities want to be able to file for what is known as Chapter 9 bankruptcy like Detroit and Vallejo, California did.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The benefit of bankruptcy is that is allows a broke government to shed some of its debt -- if a judge approve a municipality's game plan.

Will Congress act? The bill in Congress would give Puerto Rico the same rights that states have under Chapter 9. So far, the bill's only supporter in Congress is Puerto Rico's representative, who get to vote.

It might seem like a small issue in Washington, but it's a big issue for financial markets.
Puerto Rico has a tiny population -- about the size of Connecticut -- but it has a debt the size of a big state like New York. Over 20% of U.S. bond funds hold Puerto Rican debt.
The island doesn't have enough money to pay back its creditors. Some have even taken to calling it "America's Greece." Governor Alejandro García Padilla says Puerto Rico is in a "death spiral."

A lot of the trouble stems from Puerto Rico's power company, known as PREPA. It alone has $9 billion. It would be a game changer if PREPA could declare bankruptcy.

Why bankruptcy? "Chapter 9 is really the only way to impose some sort of restructuring on all the bondholders," says David Tawil, a lawyer and president of Maglan Capital.
Bond holders don't want Puerto Rico to get that because it opens the possibility that they would be forced to take a loss on their bond investment if a bankruptcy judge sides with the island.

But the proposal has little currency in Washington.

"The bill that is in Congress has no co-sponsors and no support in Congress, although it does have a fair amount of support among bankruptcy experts," says Juliet Moringiello, a professor at Widener University School of Law and a former scholar of the American Bankruptcy Institute.

Moringiello notes that Chapter 9 bankruptcy is rare, although the majority of filings have been public hospitals and utilities like PREPA, not cities.

Where the candidates stand: Jeb Bush has been a vocal supporter of statehood for Puerto Rico -- if the island's citizens want that.

"I think statehood is the best path, personally," Bush said in April. Since then, he has clarified that he thinks the island needs to make a number of changes to deal with its debt beyond just declaring bankruptcy, including reducing some benefits for workers.
On the Democratic side, O'Malley was an early supporter of Puerto Rico getting Chapter 9 bankruptcy rights.
Senator Bernie Sanders has voiced his support for Greece, but has yet to say much on Puerto Rico.

The non-Clinton alternative for Democrats // WaPo // Eugene Robinson – July 7, 2015

Is Bernie Sanders the political reincarnation of Eugene McCarthy? I doubt it, but let's hope he makes the Democratic presidential race interesting.

I don't know if front-runner Hillary Clinton shares my wish, but she ought to. I'm not of the school that believes competition for competition's sake is always a good thing. But Sanders has an appeal for younger, more liberal, more idealistic Democrats that Clinton presently lacks. If she competes for these voters — and learns to connect with them — she will have a much better chance of winning the White House.

Sanders, the Vermont independent and the only self-described socialist in the Senate, drew packed houses during a weekend barnstorming tour of Iowa. The 2,500 people who attended his rally in Council Bluffs were believed to be the largest crowd a candidate from either party has drawn in the state. This followed last week's triumph in Madison, Wis. , where Sanders packed a 10,000-seat arena with cheering supporters — the biggest event anywhere thus far in the campaign.

At the same time, Sanders is rising in the polls. The latest Quinnipiac survey showed Clinton with a 19-point lead in Iowa, 52 percent to 33 percent. As recently as May, Clinton had a 45-point advantage.

Comparisons have been made to McCarthy, the Minnesota senator whose opposition to the Vietnam War galvanized support on college campuses and stunned the Democratic Party establishment. McCarthy's showing in the 1968 New Hampshire primary — he received 42 percent of the vote — helped lead incumbent Lyndon Johnson to pull out of the race.

But let's not get carried away. A lead of 19 points is a problem any politician would love to have. Sanders's numbers had nowhere to go but up, and Clinton's nowhere but down. What's safe to say at present is that Sanders — not Martin O'Malley, Jim Webb or Lincoln Chafee — has become the non-Clinton alternative for Democrats who, for whatever reason, are suffering some Clinton fatigue.

One thing Sanders has going for himself is palpable authenticity. He is the antithesis of slick. To say there's nothing focus-grouped about the man is to understate; one doubts he knows what a focus group is. "Rumpled" is the word most often used to describe him, but that's not quite right; it's not as if his suits are unpressed or his shirttails untucked. He's just all substance and no style — which, to say the least, makes him stand out among politicians.

Clinton, by contrast, has always struggled to let voters see the "authentic" her rather than the carefully curated, every-hair-in-place version her campaigns have sought to project. Part of the problem, I believe, is that women in politics are held to an almost impossible standard; no male candidate's wardrobe choice or tone of voice receives such microscopic scrutiny. But she also distances herself by campaigning as if she's protecting a big lead — which she is — and wants to avoid offending anyone. Last, when asked her favorite ice cream flavor, she replied, "I like nearly everything." What, vanilla lovers were going to abandon her if she had said chocolate?

Sanders's main appeal, however, is that he speaks unabashedly for the party's activist left. He is witheringly critical of Wall Street, wants to break up the big banks, proposes single-payer health care and promises to raise taxes. He voted against the 2003 invasion of Iraq; Clinton, then a senator, voted for it but now says that she made a mistake.

Eight years ago, Barack Obama made opposition to the Iraq war his signature issue and rode it to victory in Iowa and beyond. Will lightning strike the Clinton machine twice?

Not the same kind of lightning, surely, and not in the same manner. Obama is a uniquely gifted politician whose appeal went beyond the issues. He was able to make voters believe not just in him but also in themselves and their power to reshape the world. And as the first African American with a legitimate chance to become president, he gave the nation a chance to make history.

This time, Clinton is the candidate with history on her side. The fact that she could be the first woman elected president is not enough, by itself, to win her the nomination. But it does matter. She, like Obama, offers voters the chance to feel a sense of accomplishment.

And nothing about Clinton's past remotely compares with the millstone of Vietnam that weighed LBJ down and ultimately caused him to give up. I just don't see a McCarthy scenario brewing — or an Obama scenario, either.

How Politico became a GOP stooge: Republicans want to destroy Hillary Clinton—and the media is helping them out // Salon // Heather Digby Parton – July 7, 2015

Aaron Blake at The Washington Post wrote a piece yesterday entitled, "The Clinton campaign is roping off reporters. But who will cry for us?" in which he lamented the treatment the press received over the weekend at the hands of Hillary Clinton. Again. If you were to read the twitter feeds of political reporters as it unfolded, it was a trauma they will not soon forget.

Here is Politico's Glenn Thrush, who saw the deeper meaning of the event immediately:

The weirdly obsessive Clinton twitter stalker Maggie Haberman of the New York Times brought all the strands of Clinton's various alleged crimes together:

Even three days later, everyone's still abuzz:

Aaron Blake recounted the event in all its chilling detail and then rather sheepishly admitted that nobody in America really gives a damn about how Hillary Clinton treats the press. (A point I made a month ago.) After all, the press is held in only slightly higher esteem by the public than loan sharks and puppy mill operators. The thinly veiled threat underneath all this outrage is that the media will react to being treated badly by giving the candidate bad press, but it's pretty clear that train left the station a long time ago when it comes to Clinton, so the cost-benefit analysis probably doesn't argue in favor of the campaign giving a damn either.

As it happens, another political reporter wrote a piece about the way the press covers Hillary Clinton yesterday and it was quite a blockbuster confessional. Jonathan Allen of Vox laid it all out:

The Clinton rules are driven by reporters' and editors' desire to score the ultimate prize in contemporary journalism: the scoop that brings down Hillary Clinton and her family's political empire. At least in that way, Republicans and the media have a common interest.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I understand these dynamics well, having co-written a book that demonstrated how Bill and Hillary Clinton used Hillary's time at State to build the family political operation and set up for their fourth presidential campaign. That is to say, I've done a lot of research about the Clintons' relationship with the media, and experienced it firsthand. As an author, I felt that I owed it to myself and the reader to report, investigate, and write with the same mix of curiosity, skepticism, rigor, and compassion that I would use with any other subject. I wanted to sell books, of course. But the easier way to do that — proven over time — is to write as though the Clintons are the purest form of evil. The same holds for daily reporting. Want to drive traffic to a website? Write something nasty about a Clinton, particularly Hillary.

As a reporter, I get sucked into playing by the Clinton rules. This is what I've seen in my colleagues, and in myself.

This does not come as a surprise to many observers. It's been obvious for more than 20 years. But it's refreshing to see a journalist admit that the dynamic is driven by the media's Ahab-like obsession with bringing down Hillary Clinton — and that this means they have a common interest with Republicans. It's not ideological, it's professional.

Allen goes on to list the unofficial rules for covering the Clintons and elaborates on each one. (There are, by his reckoning, five.) He notes that the media must always assume that the Clintons are acting in bad faith until proven otherwise, that everything is newsworthy (even things that really are nobody's business) because the Clintons are like America's royal family, and because everything Hillary Clinton does is, so the thinking goes, "fake and calculated." These assumptions distort political coverage in a dozen different ways. But it's two rules in particular which should be of very serious concern to the public.

The first is, "everything, no matter how ludicrous-sounding, is worthy of a full investigation by federal agencies, Congress, the 'vast right-wing conspiracy,' and mainstream media outlets." Allen notes that the Clintons have been investigated for 25 years and have probably revealed more about their lives, some of it intensely personal, than any other people in American public life. This has made them protective of their privacy and, perhaps perversely, fatalistic about the media's hostility. But he also notes something that we should acknowledge is a big problem for our politics:

This is, for Republicans, a reasonable strategy. They know that if they keep investigating her, it will do two things: keep the media writing about scandals that might knock her out, and turn off voters who don't want a return to the bloodsport politics of the 1990s. They leak partial stories to reporters hungry for that one great scoop that will give them the biggest political scalp of them all.

He points out that the Republicans are never able to deliver, which often plays into Clinton's hands, but that's hardly a justification for the media's behavior. There is nothing new about this arrangement. This was exactly what happened back in the 1990s. It's embarrassing for the press that so many of their ranks are either unaware of this history, don't care about it, or are taking up the challenge to harpoon that big fish without having the slightest compunction about being used by political operatives for partisan purposes. It's tragic for our country that after the ridiculous spectacle of impeachment, a stolen election, the war in Iraq, and an epic economic meltdown that our political media is still this shallow. That they are willing to enable this three-ring circus that calls itself today's Republican Party in order to gain power is frightening.

Allen's other point is: "Every allegation, no matter how ludicrous, is believable until it can be proven completely and utterly false. And even then, it keeps a life of its own in the conservative media world." That correlates to another Clinton rule, which is the "Where there's smoke there's fire" tactic. The idea is for there to be so many accusations floating around that a reasonable person must conclude that there's something to it, even if nothing has been proven. That, after all, is what Benghazi is all about.

Allen writes:

Terrorists killed four Americans. The conservative echo chamber seems convinced Hillary Clinton is at fault. The reasonable argument to make is that we shouldn't have been in Libya in the first place and the murders were a down-the-chain result of bad policy. But the right wing wants to prove that they happened because of Clinton's actions — or inaction — on security matters.

They've talked about security requests denied for Libya (never mind that the stronger contingent would have been in Tripoli, not Benghazi, and that there's no evidence Clinton herself was aware of the requests), a stand-down order that prevented reinforcements from arriving in Benghazi (never mind that they wouldn't have gotten there until after the fighting was done, and that even a House Republican committee found that there was no such order) and, most of absurd of all, that Clinton knew the attack was coming. This is how Limbaugh put it in May.

"The fact is they knew about the Benghazi attack 10 days before it was to happen. They knew who did it."

The freedom of the conservative media to make wild allegations often acts as a bulldozer forcing reporters to check into the charges and, in doing so, repeat them. By the time they've been debunked, they're part of the American public's collective consciousness. Or, as it's been said, a lie gets around the world before the truth gets out of bed.

There's more to this, however, and it goes hand in hand with the previous rule. These investigations are little more than fishing expeditions in which Republicans demand more and more information and then selectively leak juicy bits to the press for partisan purposes. Trey Gowdy's Benghazi select committee has descended into farce already, but that hasn't stopped the New York Times from breathlessly reporting it like it's Watergate.

But it's not just The Times, although they've been among the worst. Eric Wemple of the Washington Post reported that Representative Elijah Cummings came out swinging at Politico yesterday for running with leaked Clinton emails which they didn't actually see, based on intel from unidentified "sources." The selectively presented, and allegedly undisclosed, emails gave the appearance that Clinton was working hand-in-glove with adviser Sidney Blumenthal to circulate Benghazi talking points from the Media Matters, where Blumenthal was then on payroll, inside the White House — an insinuation used by Clinton detractors to suggest some sort of Benghazi coverup.

However, as the Washington Post explains:

But as Cummings notes in his letter, it didn't go down like that. The [Hillary Clinton email cited by Politico] actually attaches to a different e-mail correspondence between Clinton and Blumenthal, from a week before Blumenthal's boast about those Benghazi links. As documents released by the State Department last week show, Clinton was actually intent on sending to the White House a Salon article claiming that the campaign of Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney was planning a brand-new line of attack based on Benghazi.

Cummings rips away, "It appears that this source fed Politico an inaccurate characterization of these emails and that Politico accepted this mischaracterization without obtaining the emails themselves. The source apparently took an email that was produced to the Select Committee in February, isolated Secretary Clinton's statement about the White House, removed it from the original email exchange about the presidential debates, and then added it to a different email exchange involving Media Matters." Another point: The Politico story cites a source as saying that the e-mail wasn't among those turned over by the State Department. Cummings writes that State had passed it along in February.

Politico later issued a correction (which was clear as mud and clarified nothing).

Cummings is going to have his hands full trying to sort out these leaks. It's a dirty job, but apparently he's decided that somebody has to do it, so that somebody will be him. It remains to be seen if his work to correct the record of this Benghazi committee will have any effect. And who knows if Jonathan Allen's piece will be taken seriously by his fellow political reporters. It's clear they are using Clinton's lack of "accessibility" as a lame excuse for their sophomoric behavior, but it shouldn't take one of their own writing a Vox explainer on "the Clinton rules" for them to understand that they are being willing dupes for Republican partisans who are laughing behind their backs at their credulousness.

Hillary Clinton doesn't need to be handled with kid gloves. The presidency is a tough job. But neither does she deserve to be held to a different standard than anyone else or subject to a set of rules that are based upon lazy, false assumptions fed by partisans with an agenda they aren't even trying to hide. The fact that the press is falling so comfortably into that old groove is a testament to the fact that nobody ever paid a price for what they did the first time.

Stop the bed-wetting: Hillary Clinton's doing fine // CNN // Dan Pfeiffer – July 7, 2015

It's officially bed-wetting season in the political world when it comes to Hillary Clinton's campaign. With stories this week in Politico and The New York Times about the newly competitive Democratic primary, the whispers have begun about whether this is 2008 all over again. Back then, Clinton was defeated by Obama, an insurgent, progressive outsider.

Bed-wetting is a term of art in Obamaland. In 2008, Obama's then campaign manager David Plouffe made it famous in a New York Times article; it refers to the premature panic among pundits and party stalwarts alike during trying political times. While bed-wetting is not an affliction exclusive to a party, Democrats do seem to have a special affinity for it.

With Vermont Sen. (and presidential candidate) Bernie Sanders raising millions, exciting progressives, drawing crowds and surging in the polls, it's suddenly the Summer of Sanders. Cue the second-guessing and the handwringing over Clinton and her campaign strategy.

But while Clinton's campaign to date hasn't been perfect, she is doing exactly what she needs to do to ensure that she is the Democratic nominee and the 45th President of the United States.

A little perspective:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

First, despite Sanders' very impressive fundraising, Clinton outraised him by about $30 million. In the second quarter of 2007, Obama actually outraised Clinton. Sanders has surged in the polls, impressively consolidating the anti-Clinton vote, but the latest polls have him down 40 points nationally and 19 points in Iowa.

While Clinton had huge leads in national polls at this point in 2007, Obama was always in striking distance in the early states. This cycle, the party is much more united around Clinton; in 2008, some of the best fundraisers and strategists were looking for an alternative and found one in Obama.

Second, Sanders is a wonderful senator and a very important voice in the Democratic Party, but he is not Barack Obama.

President Obama is a once-in-a-generation political talent -- a phenomenal speechmaker and "retail politician" who is quick on his feet and possesses the ability to see around corners.

Obama also had natural inroads into two critical constituencies within the party: white college educated progressives and the African-American community, giving him broader appeal than any previous insurgent candidate.

Finally, Hillary Clinton circa 2015 is not Hillary Clinton circa 2008.

Her first campaign was beset by timidity, dissension and constant changes in strategy in reaction to the D.C conventional wisdom du jour. In Obama headquarters, we would shake our heads in bemusement at some of her campaign's decisions as we realized it was either using an outdated playbook or no playbook at all.
Her campaign this time has been disciplined, cohesive and bold. Sure there are tactical things they could have done differently, but they have a smart strategy and are executing it with a precision that reminds me of our campaign in 2008.

One of her biggest mistakes her 2008 campaign made was treating field organization as an afterthought. Our field organizers and volunteers were the heart of Obama's 2008 campaign; they were its most valued asset, were given speaking slots at campaign rallies and developed relationships with the candidate.

At her recent campaign rally in New Hampshire, one of Clinton's field organizers addressed the crowd. Reporters took mild notice, but on the various text chains, email threads and social media feeds that constitute the informal Obama alumni network, this was taken as a sign that this Hillary Campaign gets it.

There is a long road to travel before the Iowa caucuses with many potential pitfalls and a lot of work ahead for Clinton. Sanders is running a great race and the Democratic Party (and Clinton) are better for it. Clinton is not inevitable, and a Sanders win is far from impossible.

However, it's worth remembering with that with all of the Clinton campaign's mistakes and Obama's talents and advantages in 2008, we barely beat her. This time around, the environment is better and she is a better candidate, running a much better campaign against a less well-known opponent with fewer resources and a narrower coalition.

For all the contretemps about emails, speeches and roped-off reporters, elections are about fundamentals and the fundamentals point to a decisive if hard fought victory for Clinton.

A lot can change in the coming months, but at this point in the race, everyone should stop all the bed-wetting.

Donald Trump's Latino comments are just GOP orthodoxy in a cruder shell // The Guardian // Jeb Lund – July 7, 2015 alling Donald Trump an idiot is not one of those things you will find on a list of the world's most arduous tasks. But if you looked to the current field of viable Republican presidential candidates, you'd think it amounted to an impossibility on par with finding an error in the Bible. A party that desperately needs to win more Latino votes in the 2016 election evidently considers condemning Trump's depiction of Latin American immigrants as rapists and fiends something worth half-heartedly getting around to eventually.

"When Mexico (meaning the Mexican Government) send its people, they're not sending their best," he said last month, when announcing his candidacy. "They're not sending you (pointing to the audience). They're not sending you (pointing again). They're sending people that have lots of problems, and they're bringing those problems to us. They're bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists. And some, I assume are good people!"

A dozen heroic culture warriors ordinarily wouldn't take weeks to call out this sort of vitriol, especially coming from a TV personality who's spent 10 years sounding as tough as a cabbie who talks your ear off about the bar fight he broke up between "three different guys who knew karate." But there's an explanation for that lack of courage. You can't castigate Donald Trump for acting like a stereotyping, fear-mongering bully when he's just following your lead. The best you can do is accuse him of being loutish while doing it.

Here are some examples of this responsive leadership in action:

Rand Paul, 17 days later: "I don't know what he's been saying, but uh, he apparently is drawing a lot of attention." He apparently chuckled when saying this, so the thing he didn't know about was funny. Also, I suppose we should hope that "I didn't hear the thing you just said" works as well in the White House as it does as an excuse to avoid doing the dishes by pretending that you're unaware your spouse just asked you to.

Bobby Jindal, 19 days later: "I don't view people as members of ethnic groups or economic groups. This president has done too much to divide us, so obviously I disagree with [Trump's] comments. I think we need to look at people as individuals." Disagreed how? Also, Jindal's reply here is from the Baby's First Libertarian Argument Handbook, e.g. Racism and classism are forms of collectivism, which is a form of leftism, which is why leftists like Obama are the ones who create racism and class warfare.

Chris Christie, 20 days later: Trump's comments were wrong and "inappropriate," and "[I] won 51% of the Hispanic vote." Points for Christie, but after about 10 seconds on Trump, he immediately pivoted from Trump to call out Ted Cruz for being hypocritical about criticizing other Republicans. There's no indication how or why Trump is wrong or why Christie appeals to Latinos; instead, the next five minutes of the interview address Cruz, entitlement reform and tone-policing of Trump. Speaking of which:

Rick Santorum, 19 days later: "While I don't like the verbiage he's used, I like the fact that he is focused on a very important issue for American workers and particularly, legal immigrants in this country." Misuse of verbiage aside, this ducks the substance of Trump's comments, which weren't about American workers but about Mexican "felons" streaming over the border. Instead, Santorum implies that what Trump said was wrong because of how he said it, which probably isn't surprising coming from someone who, on the 2012 campaign trail, addressed "entitlements" with, "I don't want to make black people's lives better by giving them somebody else's money."

To be fair, some Republican candidates did condemn Trump. Former New York Governor George Pataki emphatically criticized The Donald, but that's the sort of thing you can do when you're polling about as well as write-in votes for Captain Kirk. Lindsey Graham, who is running for Secretary of Defense in someone else's administration, was likewise free to say something realistic.

Even a few viable candidates reluctantly stood up as slowly and vaguely as possible.

Rick Perry, 19 days later: "I will stand up and say that those [comments] are offensive, which they were." Again, Perry eventually tone-polices Trump, but what that means is anyone's guess. This is the same guy whose concerns about the appearance of offensiveness to minorities was low enough to see him vacation at Nrhead Ranch. This is also the same guy who, in August 2014, told CNN's Candy Crowley, "Since September of '08, we have seen 203,000 individuals who have illegally come into the United States, into Texas, booked into Texas county jails. And, Candy, these individuals are responsible for over 3,000 homicides and almost 8,000 sexual assaults." Which is a bunch of BS.

Jeb Bush, 14 days later: Bush said that Trump does "not represent the values of the Republican Party," in Spanish. In English, he said, "I don't agree with him. I think he's wrong." Which, hey, fair play to Bush. Four days later, he added that he "absolutely" took personal offense to Trump's comments, in light of his own family. Bush's wife, Columba, is Mexican. One wonders, though, if Bush forgot about that for two weeks.

Marco Rubio, 17 days later: "Trump's comments are not just offensive and inaccurate, but also divisive," the candidate said, before immediately laying racial problems at Obama's feet and reassuring the base about his own policies. "Our next president needs to be someone who brings Americans together – not someone who continues to divide. Our broken immigration system is something that needs to be solved, and comments like this move us further from – not closer to – a solution. We need leaders who offer serious solutions to secure our border and fix our broken immigration system." Those serious solutions amount to "securing the border" in the same vague but absolutist way that Trump would, in addition to imposing immigration standards that would not have applied to either of his parents. In effect, what Donald Trump said about the border and immigration was wrong because he labeled immigrants as felons, rather than wanting to lock them out on general principle.

But if you want to take the temperature of the Republican response to Trump, look to Ted Cruz, who in his grandstanding way can't help but give away the game. Fifteen days after Trump's comments, Cruz defended Trump against the loss of relationship with NBC, stating, "I think he speaks the truth, and I think NBC is engaging in political correctness that is silly and that is wrong." Days later, on NBC, Cruz added, "I salute Donald Trump for focusing on the need to address illegal immigration. ...The Washington cartel supports amnesty, and I think amnesty's wrong."

Brand recognize Brand, and Cruz is happy to cross-promote one as insubstantial as his. As my colleague Simon Maloy points out, it's good long-term strategy. Whenever Trump fizzles out or realizes that campaigning is work, his voters have to go somewhere, and Ted Cruz wants them to have a home. And Trump is currently polling second in Iowa and New Hampshire. Ted Cruz's interest in those voters is no different than any other candidate's. But, like Homer Simpson, he keeps accidentally saying the innocuous things in his head and the Republican inner monologue out loud.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Look back at that list. Rand Paul ducked the question, while everyone else avoided it or criticized Trump for the way he said things, not for having bad ideas about immigration. The most principled statements come from dead-enders, wafflers or hypocrites. Jeb Bush's objection showed up two weeks late and came out of the mouth of a guy who spent a career being fairly positive about immigration before doing a 180 back in 2012 to appeal to hardline Tea Partiers and is now trying to walk that back. Rick Perry is basically Trump with better hair and focus. And Marco Rubio's immigration policy probably differs from Trump's only by one gaudy border fence.

The party has run so long on nativist anxiety about foreigners plundering lady liberty, stealing jobs and slowly strangling the republic to death that the next step is just calling immigrants rapists, thieves and murderers. And thanks to years of purity testing in Republican primaries, after trying to ignore the issue for weeks, the remaining candidates have only two options left: try to join or outflank Trump to the right or try to non-ignore ignore him by writing him off as "inappropriate."

The rest of the world can just call Trump an idiot, a man with few ambitions outside of being Trumpy, whose remaining strands of what one might call policy are wisps of spun sugar extruded by hot air, reminding everyone of the tacky coif that sits atop his blanched Smithfield Ham of a face. The Republican Party can't even luxuriate in ad hominem. Yeah, they could call him an empty suit and a bozo, but that stops working the moment anyone notices that he sounds like a slightly loaded version of themselves.

Why Hillary Clinton Is Revising Expectations Downward // Commentary Magazine // Noah Rothman – July 7, 2015

"I'm baaaack!" former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton announced as she took the stage in Iowa at former Senator Tom Harkin's annual steak fry event in September of last year. Presidential campaigns are replete with bizarre moments, but perhaps none were as curious as Clinton implicitly comparing herself to the poltergeist that torments little Carol Anne in the classic flick of the same name. For a campaign that is itself haunted by the ghosts of failure, it would have been in the best interests of the inevitable Democratic nominee to make the case for candidacy beyond her own prohibitive stature within her Party. If that pillar were to collapse, Clinton's viability as Barack Obama's successor would soon follow. Today, as the specter of a modestly competitive Democratic primary looms, Clinton's campaign is at work setting back expectations for how well she will perform in the early primary states and, in doing so, is chipping away at the central pillar holding her candidacy aloft.

In an appearance on MSNBC on Monday, Clinton campaign communications director and former White House communications official Jennifer Palmieri conceded that the former secretary's campaign had become formally "worried" about the insurgent challenge to her inevitability mounted by Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders. "He will be a serious force for the campaign, and I don't think that will diminish," Palmieri confessed.

When the New York Times investigated the thinking inside the Clinton campaign, reporters discovered that there was emerging consensus that the coronation had been abruptly called off. "I think we underestimated that Sanders would quickly attract so many Democrats in Iowa who weren't likely to support Hillary," an unnamed advisor told the Times. Apparently, that fear was confirmed by other similarly well-placed sources. Ultimately, the Times report suggested what former Democratic advisor Joe Trippi contended outright: "She could lose Iowa."

Clinton's support has ebbed in recent weeks, particularly in Iowa among likely Democratic caucus-goers. The most recent Quinnipiac survey of Democrats in the Hawkeye State showed Sanders support had more than doubled since May to 33 percent while Clinton's had ebbed some from 60 to 53 percent. In a caucus state, in which energy and enthusiasm are the central elements of victory, the candidate with the most animated supporters can engineer an upset – as Clinton, who came in third in Iowa in 2008 behind Barack Obama and John Edwards, would attest.

And if Clinton's support is ebbing, she only has herself to blame. Clinton's campaign has not substantially adapted to changing political circumstances in almost a year. "[H]er remarks were neither exceptional in what she said nor particularly passionate in how she delivered them," Washington Post columnist Dan Balz wrote after digesting Clinton's steak fry performance. "They were safe and largely predictable, a kind of Democratic Message 101 heading into the most important stretch of the fall campaign."

But the midterm campaign came and went and Clinton's tactics failed to evolve. Her campaign remains safe and predictable; she projects the air of a candidate who is allergic to unscripted events and substantial contact with unscreened voters. Clinton's aversion to exposing herself to press scrutiny neared cartoonish levels when she was photographed perambulating down a New Hampshire street amid a Fourth of July parade with the media gaggle almost literally in tow, straining at the ropes that held them at a safe distance from the lofty figure in their midst.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So why would Clinton's campaign want to shed her formerly cultivated air of inevitability? Even Trippi concedes that Clinton would merely shrug off an unthinkable loss in Iowa and go on to win the nomination anyway. Why would the campaign that has spent so much energy and capital to stave off a reprise of what she described in her memoirs as an "excruciating" defeat in the Hawkeye State embrace the prospect that history might repeat itself? Perhaps because Sanders is the best challenger that Clinton could have hoped for.

A fringe politician with a small but fanatical following who once held radical and deeply impolitic social views poses about as much challenge to Clinton as former Texas Rep. Ron Paul posed to Mitt Romney. Clinton is in no danger of losing her party's nomination to Sanders in the same way she would, say, Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren. But if Clinton appears soft in a primary and, ultimately, beatable in a general, those beads of sweat dotting the brows of Democratic Party elders will soon grow into a cascading torrent. Draft efforts that failed to draw Warren, or any other credible Democrat, into the race will be resurrected. Democratic careerists who dared not challenge their party's anointed heir will think twice about whether they made the right move, and a late entry into the race might spark a stampede among skittish and unenthusiastic grassroots Clinton supporters. It is in Clinton's interests to cast Sanders as the best that the anti-Clinton elements in her party can do.

Is Hillary Clinton truly vulnerable in Iowa? Perhaps. A narrow loss is easy to envision. Might Sanders rob her of her party's nomination? That's far harder to imagine; at least, harder than it would be to see another credible Democrat with broader appeal and proper left-wing bona fides pulling off a successful coup. That's probably the true nightmare scenario that Clinton hopes to stave off by feigning injury.

'Complicated' Support for Confederate Flag in White South // NYT // Richard Fausset – July 7, 2015

Brandon Heath, Haralson County's chief magistrate judge, flies the Confederate battle flag on his property. A version of it adorns the front bumper of his cherry-red Chevrolet pickup. It is painted on the wall of the gymnasium of his alma mater, Haralson County High School, where the sports teams are called the Rebels and Rebelettes.

Like a number of people in this rural, working-class county — which is 92 percent white and just beyond the creep of Atlanta's western suburbs — Mr. Heath believes that efforts to remove the flag from public spaces across the South are "plumb ridiculous." And he insists that his reverence for the banner has nothing to do with race.

"It's just about where we come from, and locally here, we're just real proud of that," said Mr. Heath, 35, an auctioneer who, when not in court, favors camouflage ball caps and speaks with an unhurried country twang. "It's all about your school, and your upraising, and who you are."

Support for the Confederate flag may be waning among Southern lawmakers in the aftermath of the church shootings in Charleston, S.C. But here in this county of 29,000 people, as in many other stretches of the white, working-class South, the flag remains a revered symbol, not only of the Confederate dead, but of a unique regional identity.

In Haralson County, a ragged patch of low hills and homesteads at the southern tip of Appalachia, it can seem like the battle flag is baked into the culture. One finds it displayed on the welcome sign in Buchanan, the county seat, as part of the seal of the Sons of Confederate Veterans, alongside that of the Lions Club.

And while support for the flag is widespread here, its supporters, and their justifications, vary drastically: There are overt racists and avowed antiracists; students of history and those who seem oblivious to it; ardent defenders of the Lost Cause and others who do not understand why the blue-spangled X on a red field — as ubiquitous here as deer stands, church steeples and biscuits with gravy — can be so controversial.

"I just don't get why people are getting all mad about it," said Corey Doyle, 19.

Mr. Doyle, who was recently hired as a car salesman, was standing the other day with five other white protesters on a grassy berm outside the local Walmart, whose corporate office decided to pull Confederate merchandise from its shelves after the Charleston massacre.

The protesters waved the battle flag and an old version of the Georgia state flag. That state flag, which prominently incorporated the battle flag's design, was introduced in 1956 by an arch-segregationist state Legislature as courts were ordering the South to integrate. It was replaced in 2001 by lawmakers more sensitive to Georgia's image to outsiders.

Passing cars and trucks honked in solidarity as they turned into the parking lot.

Earnest Fryer, 28, an ice cream truck driver, was waving the old state flag. Asked about its segregationist origins, he drew a blank. To him, it was the flag that his father had given him, and one that had long adorned the wall of his room, he said. Like Mr. Heath and Mr. Doyle, Mr. Fryer insisted that his stand on the flag had nothing to do with matters of race.

"We don't want to offend nobody," Mr. Fryer said, noting that he was part Cherokee. Later, he said slavery was the "one thing that makes all the rest of my heritage look bad."

"But there's a lot more about us than that one thing," he added.

And yet that one thing still looms disturbingly large.

At Kimball's General Store, a popular meeting place here, a man who declined to give his name blamed blacks for the new assault on the flag, and muttered a racial slur. Near Mr. Heath's office at the county courthouse, a pickup parked beside a weatherworn house sported a pair of Confederate flags, and a window sticker that read "American Nazi Party."

Just across the county line, the Georgia Peach Oyster Bar has operated as a scandalous open secret. Its website features two Confederate battle flags, the description, "The Original Klan, Klam & Oyster Bar," and a stunningly virulent collection of racist signs. Patrons are confronted with a selection of crude cartoons and graffiti, and a menu that declares, on the appetizer page, "We cater to hangins'."

Mr. Heath acknowledged the existence of such sentiments here. But he also noted that this overwhelmingly white place, so committed to the flag, also elected a black man, H. Allen Poole, as the chairman of its Board of Commissioners in 2004, and has re-elected him twice. Last year, voters elected the state's first Asian-American Superior Court judge, Meng Lim, a Cambodian refugee who grew up in the Haralson County city of Bremen.

"It's complicated," Mr. Heath said.

For Mr. Heath, the flag helped get him elected in 2008, when he bounced around the county's rural back roads in his pickup, hunting for votes. The battle flag was affixed to the front bumper. A 12-gauge shotgun was in the gun rack, and an old bloodhound was in the back.

It was all part of a package that validated Mr. Heath's regular-guy credentials and bolstered his argument that the magistrate court would be better run by a self-proclaimed good old boy with a high school diploma than by the lawyer who was the incumbent at the time.

Mr. Heath saw it as an appeal to a common culture, not a racial gesture, a way to show voters that he was one of them: conservative, Republican (the county went 81 percent for Mitt Romney in the 2012 presidential election) and, as he said, "salt of the earth."

On a recent weekday morning, Mr. Heath gave a brief tour of Haralson County, starting with Hutcheson's Memorial Chapel and Crematory, where he introduced the owner, Danny Hutcheson, the county coroner.

Mr. Hutcheson sat in a back room that was decorated with political and historical memorabilia, including a picture of an ancestor who, according to family legend, was robbed of his cattle by Yankee soldiers during the Civil War.

He says he does not display the flag for fear of upsetting his black friends and clients. But he defends those who do.

Mr. Heath drove on to the high school where the trophy room of the gym features the battle flag painted on the wall.

Such displays have caused trouble here in the past. In September 2000, someone painted over a flag at the gym, and students were allowed to vote on whether to repaint it. Repainting won by a vote to 861 to 150, according to news reports at the time. A group of black football players threatened to boycott a game, but that never materialized. It all seemed perplexing to Cain Jackson, a 22-year-old graduate, who is white.

“I don’t see how it’s racist to anybody,” he said.

Later, Mr. Heath paid a visit to Mr. Poole, the chairman of the county commission.

Mr. Poole, a Republican, said Southern governors were wrong to take the battle flag down. He noted that he, too, had graduated from Haralson County High School in 1974, and had played safety and outside linebacker on the football team.

“I was a Rebel,” he said, “for four years.”

But not everyone is so comfortable. Angelica Griffin is also an African-American, and also played sports at the high school. She said she was “terrified” to criticize the flag while she was there.

Ms. Griffin, 28, recently completed law school at DePaul University in Chicago and is studying for the bar exam. After the Charleston shootings, she said, she posted her displeasure with the flag on social media, sparking debate and pushback from white friends back home.

“People were so apt to defend it, without even thinking about other people and how that flag makes them feel,” she said.

But Ms. Griffin also spoke about the time, in 2008, when her mother lost her job. White Haralson County neighbors showered her mother with money and gift cards so she could afford to drop her off at college.

“You know what? It doesn’t make sense,” Ms. Griffin said. “It’s the great conundrum of the South.”

Air Force jet collides with Cessna over South Carolina, killing two people // WaPo // Mark Berman – July 7, 2015

Two people were killed Tuesday morning when an Air Force fighter jet and a small civilian plane collided in the air over South Carolina, according to federal authorities.

Emergency responders rushed to a region north of Charleston, S.C., shortly after 11 a.m., as word emerged of the rare midair collision that sent debris raining down on the area below.

There were two people killed aboard the small plane, a Cessna 150, according to the National Transportation Safety Board.

The pilot of the F-16 Fighting Falcon ejected safely, according to a statement from Shaw Air Force Base in Sumter, S.C., where the aircraft originated.

Air Force officials later identified the pilot as Maj. Aaron Johnson of the 55th Fighter Squadron at Shaw. After the crash, Johnson was taken to a clinic at Joint Base Charleston to be examined.

Johnson was conducting a routine instrument training mission when the crash occurred, Col. Stephen F. Jost, commander of the 20th Fighter Wing at Shaw, said at a news conference on Tuesday afternoon.

It did not appear that Johnson had any injuries, Jost said, and the pilot was expected to return to Shaw on Tuesday evening.

“I can tell you in my experience, I haven’t had any close calls because the Air Force is very disciplined about how it operates its aircraft,” Jost said.

While Jost said that he knows about military planes colliding, he has never seen a military plane crash into a civilian one.

“It’s very rare, because of the procedures and the equipment we have in place,” he said. “It’s unfortunate.”

A spokesman for Berkeley County said the two planes collided over Lewisfield Plantation in Moncks Corner, a town about 45 minutes north of Charleston. The county government said it was setting up a command center in that town, which is near Lake Moultrie.

“From what I understand from a witness, the military plane struck the other, small aircraft broadside,” Bill Salisbury, the Berkeley County coroner and chief of the county’s rescue squad, said at an earlier news conference on Tuesday afternoon.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Debris was seen on land as well as in the water, officials said Tuesday. In the hours after the crash, authorities found the F-16's wreckage and some parts of the Cessna on the ground and the water, but they were still looking for other parts of the Cessna.

The Cessna left the Berkeley County airport in Moncks Corner just before 11 a.m. and were likely heading for Myrtle Beach, Salisbury said. He said that a wallet was found after the collision.

"We have no reason to believe that anyone survived the crash," Salisbury said.

He declined to identify the people who were on the Cessna, saying only that they were believed to be from the area. Salisbury said that officials were still working to find the two people.

"Our thoughts are with the friends and family of anyone aboard the civilian aircraft," Shaw Air Force Base officials said in the statement.

There were no reports of any injuries on the ground or any damage on the ground, a spokesman for Berkeley County said on Tuesday afternoon, about six hours after the crash.

"I turned around, and I saw the jet," Wayne Ware, who lives in the area, told the Post and Courier. "Pieces started falling out of the sky. His engine is lying right there at the campground."

Afghans and Taliban end peace talks with plans to meet again // WaPo // Sudarsan Raghavan & Tim Craig – July 7, 2015

Pakistan's Foreign Ministry said Wednesday that peace talks between representatives of the Taliban and an Afghan government delegation had concluded but would restart after the Islamic holy month of Ramadan ends in two weeks.

The talks were held Tuesday night in Murree, a mountain resort 90 minutes north of Islamabad, Pakistan's capital.

"The participants exchanged views and ways and means to bring peace and reconciliation in Afghanistan," the Pakistani statement said. "It was agreed that for lasting peace in the region, each side would approach the process in sincerity and with full commitment."

The two sides met Tuesday in what Afghan officials hoped would be a step toward negotiating a peace deal with the insurgent group and ending the country's protracted war, Afghan and Pakistani officials said.

The gathering near Islamabad, under discussion for several weeks, was not the first time the two sides have met to discuss a cease-fire. Meetings between Taliban representatives and Afghan officials have taken place in recent months in Qatar, China and Norway.

The Taliban on Twitter claimed responsibility Tuesday for two attacks that rocked the Afghan capital that same day. (Reuters)
But this meeting carried more significance because of Pakistan's long-standing ties to the Taliban, as well as Afghan President Ashraf Ghani's efforts to persuade Pakistan to play a significant role in bringing the Taliban to the negotiating table. It was the first time such a senior-level Afghan delegation has met face-to-face with Taliban representatives.

"We have always had a pretty clear view of what Pakistan can and cannot do in terms of delivering the Afghan Taliban to the negotiating table," a U.S. official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to freely discuss the peace efforts, said in a recent interview. "But we see, at this point, a sustained effort by the Pakistanis to support President Ghani's effort."

On Tuesday, Ghani's office announced through its official Twitter account that "a delegation from the High Peace Council of Afghanistan has traveled to Pakistan for negotiations with the Taliban."

The council is a body that includes former Taliban members. It was created in 2010 by then-President Hamid Karzai to negotiate with elements of the Taliban. The delegation also includes Afghanistan's deputy foreign minister, Hekmat Karzai, a cousin of the former president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to Pakistani officials, the Taliban sent four delegates representing “all top Taliban leaders.” A second U.S. official said the United States also sent representatives to the talks after being invited by the Afghan and Pakistani governments.

The meeting between the two sides took place after the end of the daily Ramadan fast, according to Pakistani officials. The talks continued past midnight.

It remains to be seen whether the talks will have any impact on the conflict, now nearing the 14-year mark. Even as meetings have taken place in various countries, the Taliban has mounted fierce offensives across Afghanistan and dispatched suicide bombers to attack government officials and symbols of official power in Kabul and elsewhere.

The second U.S. official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss sensitive negotiations, said the fact that legitimate representatives of the Taliban and the Afghan government were meeting was significant.

“That means something. . . . But how you get to a process where you start talking about substantive issues is a difficult question,” the official said.

Some analysts have suggested that the Taliban’s offensives are an attempt to strengthen its bargaining position ahead of potential peace negotiations. There is also growing concern in the Taliban about the emergence of the Islamic State, which has been wooing Taliban factions to defect and align with its cause. In Nangahar province, the Taliban is engaging in skirmishes with defectors operating under the Islamic State brand who have managed to seize control of several areas of the province. The specter of more fighters joining the Islamic State could prompt the Taliban’s leadership to agree to a political settlement with the government, some analysts say.

But there is also the question of which Taliban the Afghan government is negotiating with. The insurgency is far less cohesive today than it was in 1996, when it quickly seized power across Afghanistan. With its supreme leader, Mohammad Omar, not seen in years, many factions have become more independent from the Taliban’s core leadership. It remains unclear whether many Taliban commanders would even accept a peace agreement — or would instead continue fighting or would join the Islamic State.

Pakistan is viewed by some as a questionable intermediary. Many Afghans, including powerful political and military figures, remain suspicious of Islamabad and its motives. The Pakistani military and intelligence services have long been viewed in both Afghanistan and Pakistan as the godfathers of the Taliban, nurturing it as a proxy and providing haven to its leadership.

Pakistani officials on Tuesday said they are honest brokers.

“Pakistan, as a friend of Afghanistan, is trying to facilitate result-oriented talks between the Afghan government and the Taliban,” said a Pakistani security official who spoke on the condition of anonymity under government rules.

In a meeting Tuesday with local reporters and political analysts, Ghani said the meeting in Islamabad would focus on “confidence-building and preparing key points in the peace talks agenda,” and would set the stage for future discussions, according to a statement from his office.

Ghani said that peace talks would be led by the Afghans, suggesting that the Pakistanis would play a less visible role, and that the government was speaking with the insurgents from a position of strength, the statement said. He also said that women will continue to be part of the peace delegations.

“Our goal is reducing the violence level in the initial phase and then end it finally,” Ghani said, according to the statement.

Eurozone Sets Sunday Deadline for Greece Financing Deal // WSJ // Gabriele Steinhauser And Matthew Dalton – July 7, 2015

Eurozone leaders set Greece a Sunday deadline to come up with new and even-tougher economic measures if the country wants to avoid defaulting on the European Central Bank and crashing out of the currency union.

As a sweetener for such a deal, leaders raised the possibility of some short-term financing to help Athens make a July 20 payment and—most important for Greek Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras—action down the road to relieve Greece’s crushing debt burden.

Obstacles to an agreement that keeps Greece in the eurozone remain high, however. Most notably, the policy overhauls and budget cuts demanded go beyond those that were resoundingly rejected by Greek voters in a referendum last weekend.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel said after Tuesday's emergency summit of eurozone leaders that it is up to Greece to act. "Of course, at the very end, one will have to discuss how debt sustainability can be recreated but not by saying first 'How do we close the gap?' but "What can Greece do?' " she said.

She added that Mario Draghi, the ECB president, made clear to leaders at the summit that Sunday would be "the right moment to take decisions" for Greece to avoid a meltdown of its banking system.

Mr. Tsipras said that the negotiation process would be fast. "I believe there will be a solution by the end of the week at the latest," he said.

Leaders said that the broad outlines of such an agreement needed to be nailed down at a new summit on Sunday of the leaders from the entire European Union, including nine countries that aren't in the eurozone.

Without some new cash in the coming weeks, Greece won't be able to make the €3.5 billion ($3.8 billion) bond payment to the ECB, leading to the country's second default in less than a month.

Such a nonpayment could push the ECB to cut emergency lending to Greek banks—a move that would send the country's financial system into meltdown and force the government to print its own money to recapitalize them.

Greek banks have been shut for more than a week, after the ECB put a limit on the emergency loans they had been drawing to buffer growing deposit outflows. Cash withdrawals from ATMs have been limited to €60 a day and depositors are unable to transfer money abroad.

Some short-term funding and the prospect of a longer-term bailout deal from the rest of the eurozone could allow Greece—and the ECB—to let banks reopen and normal economic activity in the country to resume.

Getting there, however, would require a formidable turnaround by Mr. Tsipras and his government.

In addition to the pension cuts and tax increases, rejected in the referendum, a new rescue package to keep the government afloat for two to three years would require overhaul measures that had dropped out of negotiations in recent months.

These, Ms. Merkel said, include changes to labor laws to make it easier to fire workers, changes to product markets and the privatization of state assets.

"This isn't about a program from today, or from yesterday or from 10 days ago, for a program until November…this program is, according to the now-withdrawn Greek request, meant to be two years long, so it is a multiyear program," Ms. Merkel said.

"That such a multiyear program has to entail more commitments is in itself clear," she added.

Only once that is clear, leaders would look at ways to make Greece's debt sustainable again, Ms. Merkel said, adding that any debt relief wouldn't include cuts to the nominal value of rescue loans.

But talks on details of a final plan could drag on for weeks.

"The short-term deal is only possible in a longer-term deal," French President François Hollande said at his postsummit news conference. "And the short-term deal has conditionality."

A senior French official pushed the idea that Greece could get emergency financing by passing just the budget measures of a potential agreement through the Greek parliament, and passing non-budgetary, more structural changes later. But Germany may not accept that.

Emboldened by Sunday's referendum, Mr. Tsipras came to Brussels to present his eurozone counterparts a proposal for interim financing until the end of the month, a senior Greek government official said.

That would give Greece and its creditors time to work out a longer-term financing deal and avoid defaulting on the ECB.

Mr. Tsipras was hoping to use the leverage from his referendum victory to win enough of a political nudge from the summit that would allow the ECB to keep its lifeline in place.

He raised the idea of interim financing with Ms. Merkel, Mr. Hollande and Jean-Claude Juncker, head of the European Union's executive Commission, ahead of the summit, the Greek official said.

Whether the new reform commitments from Mr. Tsipras were credible, "I can't say today," Ms. Merkel said later.

At a meeting of finance ministers earlier Tuesday, Greece's new finance chief, Euclid Tsakalotos, read out proposals the government had presented last week, three European officials said.

But the new finance minister's performance raised some hopes among ministers that things had changed. "The minister Tsakalotos came for the first time in this meeting and he adopted clearly a constructive, moderate listening mode, which I think was appreciated by all the colleagues," Pierre Moscovici, the EU's economics commissioner said.

The International Monetary Fund, which Greece technically defaulted on last month, has said "comprehensive" debt relief should be included in any further bailout. But divisions still run deep in Europe.

Leaders warned Tuesday that failure to strike a deal could catapult Greece outside the common currency.

"We have a Grexit scenario prepared in detail," said Mr. Juncker.

May 21st Nightly Press Traffic Summary

- Hillary Clinton will be in New Hampshire tomorrow, continuing to discuss small business as she stops by Smuttynose brewery in Hampton and a house party in Exeter.
- Today, we unveiled a Hillary Clinton LinkedIn account and blog post to creatively amplify her small business emphasis this week, as well as turning over the Twitter account to a Portsmouth, NH, small business owner. This push generated a ton of coverage today -- here's one example: MSNBC: Hillary Clinton's small business push on Twitter, LinkedIn.
- There are a bunch of stories in the works about our June 13th kickoff rally, which we announced today. No further details have been made available yet, including location.
- With the help of the research team, we killed a Bloomberg story trying to link HRC's opposition to the Magnitsky bill to a $500,000 speech that WJC gave in Moscow.
- A new batch of Benghazi emails is reportedly scheduled to be released by the State Department sometime tonight or tomorrow.
- POLITICO (Anna Palmer) is working on a story about how Hillary's candidacy is inspiring a new wave of female donors and fundraisers.
- Amy Chozick's story on the roundtable format Hillary has been emphasizing in the campaign so far is supposed to pop tomorrow.
- AP (Jack Gillum) is trying to write a story based off old docs from the 1999 White House Conference on Philanthropy alleging that WJC pushed laws granting tax breaks for charitable donations to help with fundraising for his library. The campaign is not participating in the story.
- Annie Karni's story on the campaign acquiring the Ready For Hillary email list is likely to come out tomorrow.
- Washington Post (Karen Tumulty) is doing a story growing out of the Sid emails which says the situation shows how HRC has had too many people who have her ear, which was among the fatal flaws for her campaign in 2008, but that this time it's different.
- Michael Hirsh's deep dive on Libya is still in the works, and could come out either tomorrow or next week.

The Ukraine conflict is having serious consequences. The country is in a deep recession, Russian growth forecast was slashed down and the EU's frail recovery is threatened by a weakening demand in the eastern neighbourhood.

On behalf of 21st Austria and the Vienna Institute for International Economic Studies (wiiw) researcher Peter Havlik will present the institute's current analyses and assess the economic impact on individual European countries.

After holding the position of Deputy Director at wiiw for more than 20 years Peter Havlik is senior economist at wiiw and guest research scholar at IIASA in Laxenburg, Austria. His current research is focusing on issues related to European and Euroasian integration, competitiveness, economic developments in the CESEE countries. Peter Havlik who studied economics, economic statistics, computer sciences and sociology also worked as a consultant to the OECD, The World Bank, European Commission, the Czech and Slovak governments and a number of private companies. He was visiting professor at the Hitotsubashi University Tokyo and the chief economist at the Russian-European Center for Economic Policy (RECEP, TACIS) in Moscow.

The Vienna Institute for International Economic Studies (wiiw) is one of the principle centres for research on Central, East and Southeast Europe with 40 years of experience.

21st Austria is an initiative founded in late 2011 by leading Austrian companies together with the Austrian Central Bank and the Vienna Stock Exchange in order to start a dialogue on economic growth in Europe, with a special focus on Austria and the CEE region. It is a unique effort to explain the current basis of the country's global competitive position and to share learnings and ideas for the future.

One year out: 5 big questions that could shape the 2016 election

Susan Page

As we enter the final year of the 2016 presidential race, what are the key questions that will shape the elections and what should we be looking for

It's almost precisely one year until Election Day 2016. Between now and then, there will be no shortage of furors and fireworks, attack ads and polls. What's noise and what's noteworthy? Here's a look at five big questions with the power to shape, or reshape, who wins the White House on Nov. 8, 2016.

Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton has accused the House Republicans who are investigating her use of a private email server while secretary of State of waging partisan warfare. Last month, she emerged relatively unscathed from a congressional grilling about that and the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2012 attack in Benghazi, Libya, that killed four Americans. But she continues to face an investigation by the FBI's Counterintelligence Division into classified information found in those emails. At issue is whether she or her aides failed to appropriately safeguard intelligence information.

A negative report or even a decision to prosecute — by the Justice Department of a Democratic administration she had served — would be hard to dismiss as just politics.

Peter Zeidenberg, a former federal prosecutor who has handled some celebrated cases against public officials, says given the information known publicly, he doubts it will go that far. "Using her own server — just for the obvious reasons everyone has identified, including her — is foolish, and maybe a breach of various protocols and policies," he said in an interview. "But to the extent people are excited about the possibility of her being charged criminally because of mishandling classified materials, that seems absolutely fanciful."

He says investigators may feel some pressure to resolve the inquiry as soon as possible. FBI Director James Comey told the House Oversight Committee last month that he was following the investigation "very closely" and promised the bureau would do its work "promptly, professionally and independently."

That said, Zeidenberg acknowledged that investigations sometimes take an unexpected course. "This whole business about having an email server in the first place came as a result of an investigation that grew out of the Benghazi thing," he noted.

Can Trump go the distance?

Some in the Republican establishment seem to be going through the classic Five Stages of Grief when it comes to Donald Trump's candidacy. That started with denial that it was even possible the real-estate mogul and reality-TV star could end up as the GOP presidential nominee.

After leading in most polls through the summer and into the fall, though, Trump has gained credibility as a candidate. What's more, his biggest challenger hasn't been one of the governors or senators in the field. It's retired pediatric neurosurgeon Ben Carson, another outsider who has never run for office before. That's alarmed those Republicans — perhaps moving to intermediate stages of anger or depression — who note that it's been more than a half-century since Americans were willing to elect a newcomer to the nation's top political job.

"While I'm in the camp that eventually a mainstream 'establishment' Republican will carry the party's torch, it's clearly possible Donald could be the party's nominee," says GOP strategist Sara Taylor Fagen, a former White House political director for George W. Bush. She tempers predictions that a Trump ticket would doom the party in November. "While general-election prospects for the GOP look bad today with Mr. Trump at the helm, the electorate is very fickle right now. I'd be careful to read too much into polls now that say he can't win a general election. And we shouldn't underestimate his ability to adapt his message to new circumstances."

Just FYI: The final Kubler-Ross stage is acceptance.

Does the economy implode?

While it hasn't felt much like a recovery for middle-class Americans, the economy has been growing for the past six years. Unemployment was down to 5.1% in August and September, the lowest in seven years. Now some economists see worrying signs that a soft patch in the economy just might turn into another recession. "The dangers facing the global economy are more severe than at any time since the Lehman Brothers bankruptcy in 2008," former Treasury secretary Larry Summers warned in a*Washington Post* op-ed last month.

Jared Bernstein, a former chief economist for Vice President Biden who is now at the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities, is skeptical. "Recent recessions have been generated by what I've come to call the economic shampoo cycle: bubble, bust, repeat, but I don't see any bubbles inflating right now, and the public and household sectors are not over-leveraged." That said, he adds, "One thing that could prove me wrong would be if an economic hiccup or self-inflicted wound were exacerbated by gridlocked politics and a Fed that's largely out of ammo." Interest rates already are near zero, and the Republican-controlled Congress would be unlikely to approve stimulus spending.

If there is a downturn, history says President Obama probably would bear most of the blame — and a president's approval rating is one of the most significant single indicators of how his party will fare in elections.

"Under the safe assumption that most people aren't running Keynesian models of the macro-economy, presidents get the credit for good times and blame for bad ones," Bernstein says, even though "they typically don't deserve either."

Does Syria explode?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Syrian and other migrants after crossing the border between Austria and Germany in October. (Photo: Kerstin Joensson, AP)

The civil war in Syria has become not only a humanitarian catastrophe but also an international flashpoint, and a continuing test of President Obama's leadership.

Aaron David Miller, a former adviser on the Mideast to both Democratic and Republican secretaries of State, calls it "a kinetic situation" and "the most vulnerable place for this president and the Democratic nominee." That's because the confrontations involve not only Syrian President Bashar Assad — Obama has been demanding his resignation for the past four years, to little effect — but also leaders of Russia, Iran and the rising self-proclaimed Islamic State.

Obama's decision last month to send 50 U.S. special ops forces to Syria has increased the risks to his administration, and to his former secretary of State. Clinton has made a point in interviews and in her 2014 memoir, Hard Choices, that she advocated a more muscular response to bolster moderate Syrian rebels early in the civil war, a step Obama was loath to take. Now she supports enforcing a no-fly zone, a sort of buffer zone to protect civilians, something Obama also has rejected so far.

But there are limits to how far Clinton, who will need the support of Obama's most loyal supporters to win in 2016, can distance herself from her former boss, especially on foreign policy. "She's tried," says Miller, who is now a senior scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center. But "I think she'd have a very hard time walking away from him."

Does a third-party candidate run?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bill Clinton, Ross Perot and George Bush following their third and final presidential debate at Michigan State University in 1992. (Photo: Doug Mills, AP)

Americans say they're ready for an alternative to the two major political parties. In a USA TODAY/Suffolk University this fall , just 30% of those surveyed said the Democrats and Republicans did a good job of representing the country's political views. A 53% majority said a third party or multiple parties were necessary.

The outsider candidates in both parties have generated the most energy — Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, the Democratic socialist challenging Clinton, and Donald Trump and Ben Carson in the GOP. If they don't win the nomination, what would their supporters do? Would Trump or someone else outside the party establishment mount an independent candidacy?

The possibilities of an independent bid seem higher on the right than the left because the insider-outsider divisions are deeper in the GOP than among the Democrats.

Indeed, even if an outsider won the Republican nomination, Sara Fagen speculations one of the insiders might choose to run.

"I believe there is a strong possibility that a third-party candidate would emerge if Mr. Trump were to win the nomination," Fagen says. "If you think about it, any of these Republican governors now running would be in the middle between Trump and Clinton. Given the increasing number of people who identify as Independent, this would be the right place to be politically. If Trump were leading the Party, why wouldn't they look at it?"

Remember this: Independent candidates don't have to win the race to affect the outcome. Just ask Democrat Al Gore about the impact Ralph Nader had in 2000, or Republican George H.W. Bush about Ross Perot's bid in 1992.

Mitt Romney feels vindicated by Hillary Clinton.

At a book event for Rep. Paul Ryan, his former running mate, Romney said that Hillary Clinton distancing herself from some of President Barack Obama's foreign policy was reminiscent of the campaign he ran against the President.

"She was very critical of the president's foreign policy, and basically said 'he doesn't have one,'" Romney, the 2012 Republican presidential nominee, said, according to Bloomberg. "I used to say that during the campaign.

Romney was referring to Clinton's interview with the Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg, where the former secretary of state appeared to create space with the President on foreign policy and knock some of his guiding principles.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Great nations need organizing principles, and ‘don’t do stupid stuff’ is not an organizing principle,” Clinton said, referring to a view Obama has expressed to aides and reporters.

Clinton's split with Obama and the subsequent beltway kerfuffle – where Clinton was knocked by former Obama aides and forced to backtrack – was evidence of how difficult it would be for her to create any distance with the President.

"Hillary Clinton tries to distance herself from the foreign policy of the President," Romney said in Chicago. "That would work better were she not his secretary of state for four years."

Romney later added that if Clinton were to win in 2016 – she is the favorite for the Democratic nomination and is admittedly thinking about a run – she would just "keep these things going" like they have been under Obama.

Romney made similar statement in a Thursday night appearance with Ryan on Fox News.

"I can't begin to explain the President's foreign policy. I think Hillary Clinton tried to explain it by saying there wasn't a foreign policy, in effect," Romney said. "Rarely did I agree with what Hillary Clinton had to say but on that topic, I think we agreed. I think it's interesting that she tries to distance herself from the President's foreign policy, given the fact that she was his secretary of state for four years."

The former Massachusetts governor's critique echoes what Ryan and other Republicans have said: Clinton won't be able to shake the Obama record.

"I don't think people are going to want to have an Obama third term and no matter how she tries to shake that label, she won't be able to," Ryan said in an interview with USA Today earlier this week.

This line of questioning by Romney and Ryan has worried some Democrats.

Some Clinton associates have quietly expressed concern that one of the most effective critiques could be that her presidency, should she run and be elected, would be nothing more than Obama's third term.

"She was in his government, she was at his side," a Clinton friend and former aide told CNN. "That is, the way to go after her is four more years of the same old thing. The question they should ask her is 'Tell me 10 things that you disagree with him on.'"

Not all Democrats, especially those tasked with defending Clinton, agree that the former secretary of state will need to distance herself from Obama.

"Hillary Clinton is one of the most admired and trusted public figures in America and should she run for President, she will run on her own record and implement her own vision for moving our country forward," said Adrienne Elrod, spokeswoman of Correct the Record, a pro-Clinton communications group, in response to Ryan's critique.

Business Insider: "Mitt Romney Mocks Hillary Clinton's 'Most Embarrassing' Foreign Policy Mistake"

By Colin Campbell

August 22, 2014

Two-time Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney went out of his way to criticize expected 2016 Democratic White House contender Hillary Clinton in an interview with Fox News' Megyn Kelly on Thursday night.

Romney, asked about President Barack Obama's foreign policy towards Russia, pivoted to mock Clinton, Obama's former secretary of state, for presenting a literal "reset button" to Russia's foreign minister in 2009. Relations between the U.S. and Russia have since sharply deteriorated.

"I worry about the country," Romney said. "The president got those things wrong. Unfortunately he underestimated Russia. This whole 'reset policy' with Hillary Clinton — smiling ear from ear, pressing a red reset button — I think is one of the most embarrassing incidents in American foreign policy."

In July, Clinton defended the "reset" policy, insisting it worked at the time.

"The reset worked," Clinton said, according to CNN. "It was an effort to try to obtain Russian cooperation on some key objectives while Medvedev was president."

At another point in the Fox interview, Romney also went after Clinton for her recent statements separating herself from Obama's foreign policy. Among other things, Clinton appeared to dismiss Obama's "don't do stupid stuff" philosophy. But Romney argued Clinton can't separate herself from Obama's blunders overseas.

"I can't begin to explain the president's foreign policy. I think Hillary Clinton tried to explain it by saying there wasn't a foreign policy, in effect. Rarely did I agree with what Hillary Clinton had to say but on that topic, I think we agreed. I think it's interesting that she tries to distance herself from the president's foreign policy, given the fact that she was his secretary of state for four years," Romney said.

There is speculation swirling that Romney is interested in taking another shot at the White House in 2016. However, Romney, appearing with his former vice presidential nominee, Congressman Paul Ryan (R-Wisconsin), suggested Ryan should run instead.

"I had my turn. It's his turn now," Romney said.

"You should do it," Ryan replied.

Politico: "Where Mitt Romney agrees with Hillary Clinton"

By Kendall Breitman

August 22, 2014, 8:47 a.m. EDT

Former Massachusetts Governor and Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney did something unexpected on Thursday night — he agreed with Hillary Clinton.

For the first time since their 2012 run for the White House, Romney and Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) took part in a joint interview for Fox News. During the interview, Romney focused mainly on his criticisms of the Obama administration's foreign policy.

"I think Hillary Clinton tried to explain it by saying there wasn't a foreign policy in effect," Romney said to host Megyn Kelly. "And rarely did I agree with what Hillary Clinton has to say, but on that topic I think we agreed."

In an Aug. 11 interview with The Atlantic, the former secretary of state had critical words for President Barack Obama's foreign policy. During the interview, Clinton called Obama's decision not to get involved in Syria a "failure" and that "don't do stupid stuff" is "not an organizing principle."

Romney continued the criticism on "The Kelly File," saying that Obama has underestimated threats around the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The president has a foreign policy which has failed once again. He underestimated the extent of the threat represented by terror in the world, and specifically ISIS,” Romney said. “And as a result, now we find ourselves facing a series of severe and horrific scenes on the world stage.”

Kelly closed the interview by asking the duo who would make a better president. Ryan immediately pointed to Romney.

“He’s very generous,” Romney said. “But I had my turn. It’s his turn now.”

CBS (DC): “‘Third Time’s The Charm': Ryan Would ‘Love To See’ Romney Run Again”

[No Writer Mentioned]

August 22, 2014

U.S. Rep. Paul Ryan said Thursday he would love to see Mitt Romney run again for president and teased the GOP’s former nominee at one point that the “third time’s the charm.”

Appearing with Ryan at a public event for the first time since their ticket lost two years ago, Romney offered his own good-humored praise by saying that Ryan “wouldn’t be a bad president” himself.

Ryan, R-Wis., has said he will wait until after the midterm elections to decide whether to pursue his own presidential campaign in 2016. Romney has repeatedly denied any plans for another campaign for president. He failed to win the nomination in 2008 and then lost the election to President Barack Obama in 2012.

Romney interviewed Ryan about his new book, “The Way Forward: Renewing the American Idea,” on the brink of the fall election season. Republicans are driving for the six-seat gain required to grab the Senate majority. Success would put the GOP in control of Congress and dramatically shape the final two years of Obama’s term.

They took turns criticizing Obama’s record on domestic issues, including the economy, health care and immigration, with Ryan warning that Obama will “poison the well” on immigration compromise if he takes any unilateral action. Romney said Obama sent a message to Russia when he did not act in Syria and that there has been “an explosion of very bad things in the world” since then.

Romney said Obama’s foreign policy is “based on his belief that everyone has the same interests” while he himself believes that some people “want to dominate and some are fundamentally evil.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

They also blamed Obama and the Democratic-led Senate for doing too little to reach out to Republicans and to act on important issues.

“If people want to actually see action in this country and dealing with problems from education to health care, immigration to our fiscal needs … they’re going to have to vote for Republican senators and … a Republican president, as well,” Romney said.

Romney stated that Hillary Clinton won’t be able to distance herself from Obama if she decides to run for president.

“Hillary Clinton tries to distance herself from the foreign policy of the president,” Romney said, according to Bloomberg. “That would work better were she not his secretary of state for four years.”

Romney added: “She was very critical of the president’s foreign policy, and basically said he doesn’t have one. I used to say that during the campaign.”

Ryan told reporters after the question-and-answer session with Romney that he would “love to see Mitt Romney run for president again.”

Long before Romney and Ryan took the stage at the Union League Club of Chicago, Democrats said the pairing is a reminder of failure. In a statement, the Democratic National Committee listed what it called their memorable political gaffes, including Romney being caught on video telling donors that 47 percent of Americans would automatically vote for Obama because they don’t pay income taxes and are “dependent upon government.”

Romney has been campaigning for GOP candidates across the country, most recently for Rep. Tom Cotton this week in Arkansas, and Ryan has been promoting his book. Romney himself reviewed Ryan’s manuscript and offered notes. And Ryan even sought advice from former Romney speechwriters and advisers during the writing.

The conversation Thursday centered on policy issues and didn’t touch on the more personal parts of Ryan’s book, including the fullest account yet of how Ryan, at 15, found his alcoholic father dead in bed from an apparent heart attack. Ryan told The Associated Press recently that the event shaped him as a politician and family man, and figures heavily into whether he’ll seek the presidency in 2016.

Although writing a book often is seen as a prelude to a presidential campaign, Ryan has said he’s not sure he’s ready to spend more time away from Janesville, the small Wisconsin town where he grew up and where he and his wife, Janna, have raised their three children.

WMUR-TV (N.J.): “Man who held hostages at Clinton campaign office approved for parole”

[No Writer Mentioned]

August 22, 2014, 8:11 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Judge grants Leeland Eiseberg parole for Oct. 20

A man who took hostages at a Hillary Rodham Clinton presidential campaign office in 2007 has been approved for parole.

A judge granted Leeland Eisenberg parole for Oct. 20.

Eisenberg, 53, spent about two years behind bars for the November 2007 siege at Clinton's Rochester campaign office in which he claimed to have a bomb. No one was hurt in a five-hour standoff and the bomb turned out to be road flares.

At his arraignment, his lawyer portrayed Eisenberg as a man at the end of his rope emotionally after being repeatedly turned down when he sought psychiatric help.

Eisenberg was later arrested two more times, once for violating parole and for walking away from a halfway house.

Once released, he would be sent to transitional housing.

The State (S.C.): “Staff of US House Benghazi investigation committee coming together”

By Mary Troyan

August 22, 2014

WASHINGTON — The former top lawyer for the U.S. Army will be chief counsel for Republicans on the House committee investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi, Libya.

Retired Lt. Gen. Dana Chipman was judge advocate general for the Army from 2009-2013.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The special committee, led by Rep. Trey Gowdy, R-Spartanburg, is preparing for its first public hearing in September.

Chipman “is a person of great character and integrity, with outstanding legal credentials, who dedicated his professional life to the apolitical service to our country and reached the highest levels of his profession,” Gowdy said Thursday through a spokeswoman.

“If you are serious about conducting a fair, thorough, fact-centric investigation devoid of gratuitous partisanship, it stands to reason you would select someone with those same characteristics to lead the investigation,” he said.

The committee, with seven Republicans and five Democrats, was created by the House in May to investigate the attacks on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi that led to the deaths of Ambassador Christopher Stevens and three other Americans.

Gowdy’s committee is consolidating the work of several prior congressional investigations into security lapses before the attacks, the military response during the attacks, and how President Barack Obama’s administration handled the aftermath.

Chipman will be chief counsel for the committee’s GOP majority.

Democrats, led by Rep. Elijah Cummings of Maryland, are hiring their own staff. The committee’s budget is $3.3 million, and it is expected to continue its investigation well into 2015.

Chipman, who earned degrees from the U.S. Military Academy and Stanford Law School, was deployed during Operation Enduring Freedom in 2001 and 2002 as legal adviser to a joint special operations task force, according to his Army biography.

Republicans Look to Turn Conversation to Education

Jeb Bush at the Iowa State Fair in Des Moines last week. Eric Thayer for The New York Times

By Maggie Haberman

Good Wednesday morning from Washington. Democrats are quietly counting their Iran votes, and President Obama remains on vacation, hoping things stay as unexciting as possible. Senator Marco Rubio of Florida is getting some attention for his throwing arm, while several other Republicans are heading to New Hampshire to talk education.

The Republican presidential contest will shift its debate from immigration to education policy on Wednesday, as several candidates gather in New Hampshire to discuss the future of schools.

The news site The Seventy Four, which was created by former television journalist Campbell Brown, will hold a first-of-its-kind public forum featuring about a third of the extensive Republican field: Jeb Bush, Chris Christie, Bobby Jindal, Carly Fiorina, Scott Walker and John R. Kasich. The event can be viewed live here.

Ms. Brown has become an advocate of overhauls to the education system, including changes to the teacher evaluation systems that are part of union contracts. For Mr. Bush, education policy has been a signature issue over the last decade, and the forum gives him a chance to highlight those credentials.

But within the Republican contest, education policy has become a fraught topic, particularly around the Common Core education standards. Mr. Bush favors those standards, which many conservative voters oppose.

Unlike in a debate format with a 60-second response time, Mr. Bush may have more of an opportunity to explain his views. As for Mr. Christie and Mr. Walker, who both had high-profile fights with the teachers' unions in their respective states, the format will most likely let them showcase their claims to the education battle.

Obama Looks to Avert the Vacation Curse

If there is a common sentiment among the White House staff members, journalists and Secret Service agents who have followed Mr. Obama and his family to Martha's Vineyard, it is this: Don't do anything to jinx things.

For the first time in years, Mr. Obama has so far dodged anything that might interrupt his family vacation. There has been no international crisis. No domestic upheaval. No budget standoff. No looming epidemic or storm.

For once, Mr. Obama has been free to golf, have long dinners with friends, take walks with his children and hang out at the beach. There have been no briefings by White House officials. There have been no on-camera presidential statements.

That's rarely been the case.

In 2009, during his first trip to Martha's Vineyard as president, Mr. Obama was forced to skip off the island to deliver a eulogy for Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, who passed away on Aug. 25 that year. Mr. Obama had already interrupted his vacation once that year to reappoint Ben S. Bernanke as the chairman of the Federal Reserve.

Last year, the first week of Mr. Obama's vacation was consumed by riots in Ferguson, Mo., and the escalation of fighting against the Islamic State in Syria and Iraq. Just days after he arrived here in 2014, Mr. Obama confirmed the beheading of James Foley, an American journalist, in a live statement from an elementary school here. The White House later announced that an earlier rescue operation had failed.

This time, Mr. Obama is past the halfway mark in his vacation without a crisis. He went to the beach with his family on Tuesday and is likely to watch the island's annual fireworks on Friday.

Unless something jinxes things.

Menendez Pans Iran Deal as Democrats Count Votes

Senator Robert Menendez on Tuesday delivered a blistering critique of the Iran nuclear deal negotiated by the Obama administration, saying in a speech at Seton Hall University in New Jersey that "if Iran is to acquire a nuclear bomb, it will not have my name on it."

His position on the agreement was no surprise since Mr. Menendez, a New Jersey Democrat, has long since telegraphed his opposition. Neither was his tone since he has clashed harshly with Mr. Obama over foreign policy issues such as Iran and the thaw with Cuba.

Mr. Menendez pointedly took issue with the president's characterization of opponents of the deal as the same lawmakers who wrongly supported the war in Iraq, "I opposed it, unlike the vice president and the secretary of state, who both supported it."

That reference was, of course, to Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. and Secretary of State John Kerry, who both initially backed the Iraq war.

Mr. Menendez also disputed the president's claim that the alternative to the agreement was conflict with Iran, and he urged the president to reopen the talks. The question now for the administration is not how Mr. Menendez will vote, but how much he will influence the votes of other Democrats.

Our Favorites From The Times

- Mr. Trump has put Republicans in a difficult position by taking such a hard line on immigration.

- Hillary Rodham Clinton broke ranks with Mr. Obama on the subject of drilling for oil and gas in the Arctic Ocean.

- Text messaging — an old thing — is proving to be the next big thing in campaign politics this election cycle.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- In a call with donors, Mr. Walker acknowledged criticisms that he lacked passion in the first debate and said that he would spend more time taking on Washington to counter the rise of outsider candidates like Mr. Trump.

What We're Reading Elsewhere

- Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina told The Des Moines Register that there was nothing "behind the curtain" when it came to Mr. Trump, and he predicted the billionaire's political downfall.

- Slate looks at the Black Lives Matter movement's focus on Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, and asks: "If Sanders is the most racially progressive candidate in the race," as his team and supporters say he is, "then why is he a target for Black Lives Matter activists, even after he addressed core concerns over police violence and criminal justice reform?"

- Philip Bump at The Washington Post argues that ending birthright citizenship, as Mr. Trump said he would do and as Mr. Walker suggested he wanted to do, would be "nearly impossible."

- Eli Stokols of Politico details Mr. Rubio's slow and steady approach in Iowa.

- After her strong performance at the "kiddie table" debate this month, Ms. Fiorina is polling strongly enough to possibly earn a spot on the main debate stage next month, knocking off Mr. Christie, at least according to the latest surveys, Politico reports.

Rubio's Errant Football Toss Starts Twitter Spiral

Mr. Rubio may have found a way to steal some of the attention that has been lavished on Mr. Trump in recent weeks: hit a child in the face with a football.

Mr. Rubio's throw was the talk of Twitter on Tuesday after a video emerged of him tossing spiral to a young Iowan this week. The boy overran the pass, and the ball collided with his nose.

The dropped ball unleashed a flurry of commentary about Mr. Rubio's throwing form, and even some suggestions that he send a Hail Mary pass in Mrs. Clinton's direction.

The child recovered from the incident, and the Rubio campaign, always happy to make lemonade from a lemon, managed to squeeze a fund-raising opportunity out of it. Team Marco T-shirts are now available at the online campaign store for $28.

I wonder if we should try a version of the DMR spot with our endorsement groups too. Planned Parenthood, HRC, Labor, LCV, Gabby Giffords etc -- something that gives a big sense of momentum will face enormous challenges.

I think these groups actually have more impact on voters than the DMR (a lot of good they did us in 2008!)

Domestically, this president must work with Congress in confronting the issues of immigration, health care, increased threats to national security, the disappearing middle class, the growing deficit, Social Security solvency, gun control, renewable energy, sentencing reform and more.

On the world stage, this president will have to work with foreign leaders in dealing with ISIS and other terrorists, climate change, the containment of nuclear threats posed in North Korea and Iran, the Russian incursions in Ukraine and foreign trade.

The presidency is not an entry-level position. Whoever is sworn into office next January must demonstrate not only a deep understanding of the issues facing America, but also possess the diplomatic skills that enable presidents to forge alliances to get things done.

By that measure, Democrats have one outstanding candidate deserving of their support: Hillary Clinton. No other candidate can match the depth or breadth of her knowledge and experience.

As first lady, she worked tirelessly on health care reform and, with bipartisan support, created the Children's Health Insurance Program that provides coverage for 8 million children.

As a senator, she reached across party lines and joined forces with conservatives, including Sen. Lindsey Graham and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to fight for job creation and universal health care.

NASH: Register faced tough decision in endorsements

RELATED:A history of Register caucus endorsements

As secretary of state, she helped secure international sanctions against Iran and redefined her job by expanding America's diplomatic agenda to include poverty, women's rights, the environment and other issues.

She is not a perfect candidate, as evidenced the way she has handled the furor over her private email server. In our endorsement of her 2008 campaign for president, we wrote that "when she makes a mistake, she should just say so." That appears to be a lesson she has yet to fully embrace.

Her changing stance on gay marriage, immigration and other issues has invited accusations that she is guided less by personal conviction than by political calculations. She refutes that, and argues persuasively that a willingness to change one's thinking on specific issues, while remaining true to what she calls "the same values and principles," is a virtue, one lacking in most politicians.

Over the course of two meetings, Clinton spent more than three hours with the editorial board, answering questions in a direct and forthright manner. She exhibited an impressive command of the issues, though we'd have liked to hear more from her on the debt and the future of Social Security. She was somewhat prickly and defensive when discussing her emails, but overall she was gracious, engaging and personable.

Her chief opponent for the nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has proven to be an honorable and formidable campaigner, and it's very likely that without him in the race, candidates in both parties wouldn't be discussing America's growing inequality in wealth and income.

Sanders has tapped into the public's anger and frustration with Washington, without demonizing government and resorting to the cheap demagoguery favored by Donald Trump and others. He has shown himself to be a man of courage and principle who has the ability to rally others to his cause.

But Sanders admits that virtually all of his plans for reform have no chance of being approved by a Congress that bears any resemblance to the current crop of federal lawmakers. This is why, he says, voters can't simply elect him president, but must instead spark a "political revolution."

Easier said than done. Congress has the largest Republican majority since the 71st Congress of 1929-31.

A successful Sanders presidency would hinge on his ability to remake Washington in his own image. It's almost inconceivable that such a transformation could take place, even with Democrats controlling both chambers of Congress.

As for Martin O'Malley, the data-driven, wonkish former Maryland governor who has gained little traction in the campaign so far, he seems better suited to a Cabinet-level job in a Clinton White House.

In the final analysis, Iowa Democrats will have to choose between the lofty idealism of Bernie Sanders and the down-to-earth pragmatism of Hillary Clinton. For some, this will be a choice of whether to vote with their hearts or their heads.

Clinton has demonstrated that she is a thoughtful, hardworking public servant who has earned the respect of leaders at home and abroad. She stands ready to take on the most demanding job in the world.

Most recently, I met with Tom Nides at the World Economic Forum in Davos to ask him the best way to plug-in to the policy side. He told me that you would be heading the policy and issues side of the campaign.

I have been privileged to work for all eight years of the Clinton Administration as U.S. Ambassador to the European Union; Under Secretary of Commerce for International Trade; Under Secretary of State for Economic, Business & Agricultural Issues; and as Deputy Secretary of the Treasury. During over six of those years, I also served as Special Adviser to the President and Secretary of State on Holocaust Issues, negotiating over $8 billion in recoveries in negotiations with the Swiss and French banks, German and Austrian corporations for slave and forced labor, European insurance companies for unpaid insurance policies, and with over 40 countries for the Washington Principles on Nazi-looted art, which has led to the restitution of thousands of stolen art works. In this work, I was strongly supported by both President Clinton and then-First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, who frequently asked to be briefed.

My relationship with her continued when she (as President Clinton had done) graciously agreed to speak to my Eizenstat Family Memorial Lecture series in Atlanta at the Ahavath Achim Synagogue, before over 2500 people. In her term as Secretary of State, she appointed me as her Special Adviser on Holocaust Issues, and in that capacity, I negotiated a $50 million agreement with Lithuania, and headed the U.S. delegation to the 2009 Prague Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets (which produced the Terezin Declaration) and the 2010 Prague Conference on Best Practices and Guidelines for the Restitution and Compensation of Real Property Confiscated by the Nazis and their allies from 1933-45.

My late wife Fran and Hillary worked at the Children's Defense Fund, and Hillary was especially kind to her over the years. When Fran passed away in 2013, she and President sent moving, handwritten notes of condolence, which I cherish to this day.

Because every word she utters is put into a campaign context, permit me to suggest areas in which I could be helpful, even now, before any formal campaign may be announced, and thereafter, if there is a formal announcement.

1. IRAN

As President Carter's Chief White House Domestic Policy Adviser, I helped shape the original hostage-related sanctions against Iran.

As Deputy Secretary of the Treasury in the Clinton Administration, I took the lead in imposing the first sanctions against Osama Ben Laden and al Qaeda. For the past three years I have chaired the Iran Task Force of the Atlantic Council (the first year as co-chair with Chuck Hagel, before he became Secretary of Defense) We have put out over a dozen published reports on all aspects of the Iranian situation, for the nuclear talks to their internal political and economic challenges, and have organized scores of conferences with leading experts. In this capacity, I have met with Iranian Foreign Minister Zarif in small, private meetings at their UN Mission in New York in 2013 and 2014, on the margins of the UN General Assembly and have reported the results to senior people in the Administration.

Our Task Force has been generally supportive of the Obama Administration's negotiations. Needless to say, if and when an agreement is reached on a nuclear deal, which I anticipate, this will become a political "hot potato". I can be helpful in shaping a response.

2. SANCTIONS AND GENERAL FOREIGN/DEFENSE POLICY

During the Clinton Administration, I was the "sanctions-meister", successfully negotiating sanctions issues with the European Union under the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act, the Helms-Burton Act, and the Religious Freedom Act. As I mentioned, I was involved in Iran sanctions issues from the Carter through the Clinton Administration, and now with the Atlantic Council.

But I have also become very knowledgeable in my private practice with the Ukraine-Russia related sanctions.

I am on the Defense Policy Board (appointed by Secretary of Defense Hagel), and we have focused on issues like Russia/Ukraine, ISIS, Iraq, and Syria.

3. INTERNATIONAL TRADE

I was involved as President Carter's Domestic Policy Adviser and Director of the White House Domestic Policy Staff, with the completion of the Tokyo Round of the WTO in 1977, led by Special Trade Represented Bob Strauss, and then the Uruguay Round in 1994, as U.S. Ambassador to the European Union, led by Special Trade Representative Mickey Kantor. I also served under Mickey as his Under Secretary of Commerce for International Trade, where I traveled around the world promoting American trade and investment, and then as Under Secretary of State, working on many of the same issues, but from a broader diplomatic perspective. I was involved in the China MFN issue.

As U.S. Ambassador to the European Union, I created, along with then Commerce Secretary Ron Brown, the Transatlantic Business Dialogue (TABD), which remains the officially recognized business voice on transatlantic trade issues by both the U.S. government and the European Union. To this day, I am the American chair of the Transatlantic Business Council (TABC), of which TABD is a part.

I chair the international trade and finance practice at Covington & Burling, LLP, and was selected recently as Trade Lawyer of the Year by the American Lawyer magazine. I have testified several times on international trade issues, particularly the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP). President Obama's Trade Representative Mike Froman and I meet frequently, most recently at the TABD/TABC meeting in Davos. He asked me to provide advice on the regulatory reform part of TTIP, along with a few other trade experts.

The Transpacific Partnership (TPP) will come before TTIP, as will Trade Promotion Authority (fast-track). All of these to one degree or the other will be opposed by labor and consumer groups. I believe I can help you shape positions on these.

4. EUROPEAN UNION

Having been U.S. Ambassador to the European Union (1993-96), negotiating with them frequently during the Clinton Administration, co-chairing the TABC, and writing articles on the EU (e.g. with our current U.S. Ambassador to the EU Tony Gardner in the 2010 Foreign Affairs Magazine), I believe I understand the EU as well as almost anyone. The EU is an increasingly important economic and political partner (e.g. Iran and Russian sanctions). I am well known in Brussels and can be helpful as an informal emissary there.

5. CLIMATE CHANGE

I was the head of the U.S. delegation, as Under Secretary of State, to the Kyoto Protocol negotiations, and played a central role in its negotiations, including aligning the positions of the EU, Japan, and other major industrial democracies with that of the U.S. I worked closely with then Vice President Gore and senior people in the White House, including Gene Sperling. I have continued to stay engaged in climate change issues. With the December 2015 Paris Climate Change Conference coming up, this issue will receive a great deal of visibility going into the 2016 election year.

6. ISRAEL, MIDDLE EAST PEACE PROCESS, JEWISH ISSUES

During the 2008 campaign, I served as a frequent surrogate speaker for the Hillary Clinton campaign on Israel and Jewish issues.

As Under Secretary of State and Deputy Secretary of the Treasury, I was responsible for dealing with the economic aspects of the peace process, while Dennis Ross led the political side. I negotiated some half dozen times with Yasir Arafat, worked on the QIZs in Gaza and Jordan (which I visited), the airport in Gaza, getting Palestinian workers and VIP Palestinian business leaders into Israel, and on other economic initiatives. Of course, this was done in close coordination with senior Israeli officials. As Under Secretary of State, I also negotiated with then Finance Minister Jacob Neeman, the phase-out of the economic assistance program for Israel, in return for increased levels of military assistance.

I also headed the U.S. government side of the joint U.S.-Israel Economic Dialogue during the Clinton Administration.

As a result of co-chairing with Dennis Ross, the Jewish People's Policy Institute of Jerusalem, a think tank created by the Jewish Agency and supported by major UJA Federation heads and major Jewish donors, Dennis and I meet for up to two hours annually with Prime Minister Netanyahu and his Cabinet to present our Assessment of the State of the Jewish People, for which Dennis and I do the Introduction. I have worked with the Prime Minister since his years as Finance Minister, and we have maintained a close relationship, despite our contrary views on settlements. I know most of the major figures in the Israeli political firmament. I travel to Israel two to three times a year, and have a vast array of friends and relatives there. Both my grandfather and great-grandfather are buried in the Petach Tikva cemetery.

For the past several decades, I participate in a small, off-the-record breakfast group, with the Israeli Ambassadors to the U.S., all of whom I know personally, most recently with Ron Dermer. Fran and I were so close to Ron and his family, that we went to his bar mitzvah in Miami, and remain a frequent guest at private events at his home. I have a close relationship with Howard Kohr of AIPAC, but at the same time, I am respected by the J Street group. Indeed, before he created J Street, Jeremy Ben-Ami came to seek my advice, and I urged then Ambassador Michael Oren to end the Israeli Embassy boycott of J Street, which they did, up to a point.

I could serve as a formal or informal emissary to Israeli government officials. I could also help with drafting and/or reviewing speeches on the Middle East peace process. I also know Palestinian officials. At Davos, for example, I participated in an off-the-record session "Breaking the Impasse" with the deputy prime minister and finance minister of the Palestinian Authority, and leading Palestinian and Israeli business people. I proposed to him the creation of QIZs in the West Bank, for example. Remarkably, while there was one in Gaza, that was very successful before the second intifada, and over a dozen in Jordan, there are none in the West Bank.

I have a great deal of visibility in the American and world Jewish community due to my ongoing Holocaust work; my co-chairmanship with Dennis of JPPI; two books ("Imperfect Justice; Looted Assets, Slave Labor and the Unfinished Business of World War II" on my Holocaust negotiations, in 2003 an later translated into four languages; and in 2012 and a new version in 2014, "The Future of the Jews: How Global Forces are Impacting on the Jewish People, Israel, and its Relationship with the United States"); frequent articles in Jewish publications, and speeches to Jewish audiences in the U.S. and around the world, from college campuses to federations to the General Assembly of the Jewish Agency to the upcoming AIPAC conference; my ongoing Holocaust negotiations; and my chairmanship of the Defiant Requiem Foundation, which has sponsored a concert-drama around the world (Kennedy Center, Lincoln Center, Jerusalem, Berlin, Prague, Budapest, etc.) called "Defiant Requiem: Verdi at Terezin", which honors a Jewish prisoner chorus at Theresenstadt concentration camp and the documentary "Defiant Requiem", which likewise honors the broader courageous artistic and musical performances at Theresenstadt. Our documentary was nominated for two Emmy awards in 2014 (best full-length documentary and best script), has been shown on PBS on Yom Hashoah day in 2013, and has been purchased by Netflix and BBC.

I continue to serve as Special Adviser on Holocaust Issues to Secretary of State Kerry, as I did for then-Secretary of State Clinton. On December 8, 2014, I signed in the State Department's Treaty Room a $60 million agreement with the French government for those current non-French citizens in the U.S., Israel, and around the world, who were involved in the deportations from France to the death camps, their spouses, and heirs. It was a widely-heralded breakthrough 70 years after the end of World War II. I am also working on the Gurlitt looted art case in Munich, and have met with the German Minister of Culture on this matter, with signficant results.

In my private capacity, since 2009, I have headed the negotiating team of the Jewish Claims Conference in their annual negotiations with the German Finance Ministry. Since 1952, the Claims Conference the official body for negotiations with the German government on behalf of Holocaust survivors. During that time, I have negotiated over $1.5 billion in benefits, including a landmark 2013 agreement for $1 billion in home care through 2017.

7. BUSINESS COMMUNITY

As a result of my corporate boards (UPS, BlackRock Funds, Alcatel-Lucent, Globe Specialty Metals), advisory boards (Christie's, GML Holdings, and formerly chair of the Coca-Cola International Advisory Board), co-chairmanship of the Transatlantic Business Council (with some sixty U.S. and European companies), and joint projects with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, I could help the campaign as a liaison/spokesman with the U.S. business community.

8. GENERAL POLITICAL AND POLICY ADVICE

I have been involved in senior capacities in presidential campaigns since the 1968 Hubert Humphrey campaign, for which I served as his research director, and the 1976 Jimmy Carter campaign, for which I was policy director. I have helped with policy issues in the Dukakis campaign, and Bill Clinton's campaign. I have a keen sense of the combination of policy and political factors.

Due to my work in the Carter and Johnson White Houses (my first job after Harvard Law School in 1967-68), and as Deputy Treasury Secretary, I am knowledgeable on a wide range of domestic issues, including job training (I recently co-authored an article on an apprenticeship program for the U.S., modeled on the German and Swiss models) health care, tax policy, as well as international economic policy.

I am sorry to have gone on so long, but wanted to give you the fullest menu from which you can feel free to enlist my assistance. I practice law full-time, and serve on four corporate boards, as well as chairing the Defiant Requiem Foundation and co-chairing JPPI and TABC. But, I am prepared to give you considerable time. I am also prepared to contribute a substantial amount financially, and to help raise more, although I know this is not your jurisdiction.

Dear Jake,
It is clear the campaign and Hillary want to be seen as simply praising the Iran deal without any of the qualifications and assurances to our allies we have discussed for weeks. You had even strengthened the language I proposed on using all means to stop an Iranian nuclear weapon during or after the expiration of the term of the Agreement. Is this now all by the boards? I am very concerned about her loss of Jewish and moderate support, without the kind of statement I assumed would be forthcoming.

Best wishes,

Stu

Here's Obama in 2007:

Barack Obama, 2007

Thank you so much. To the great Governor of Iowa and Lieutenant. Governor of Iowa. To my dear friend Tom Harkin for the outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi , Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

Unclear exactly what 60 is doing, but Craig has had an initial meeting with them to see if we can finesse this from starting off in such a ridiculous place as to have its premise be that book. Let's also remember that the last time 60 went hard on a book that tried to scandalize something related to us it was the Benghazi telling by the former British commando, and the outcome was Lara Logan's suspension and the publisher having to pull the book off the shelves.

So the hope is that before we start having to push back on the story we have at least some hope of combatting the premise as ridiculous.

And of course, having the book would help that.

I'll keep everyone posted.

McCain Heads To Texas To Sell His Soul To Big Oil

Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) is heading to Texas today for a series of fundraisers with the Texas GOP elite in Dallas , San Antonio , and Houston . Wedged between the multiple money events will be a speech in Houston, which McCain has indicated will be on energy policy. Today, McCain told reporters that he will call for :

– Lifting the federal moratorium on off-shore drilling established by President George H.W. Bush,

– Providing incentives to states to commence off-shore drilling, and – Suspending the gas tax .

This suite of proposals adds up to a big fat kiss to Big Oil and its conservative allies — at the expense of everyone else. Unrestrained fossil fuel use delivers obscene profits for Big Oil but is a threat to the planet . McCain's strong talk on global warming is proving unserious — much as candidate Bush's campaign pledge to regulate carbon dioxide in 2000 turned out to be false . At the very same press briefing, McCain backtracked from his vaunted mandatory system to reduce greenhouse gases.

Strapped for cash and surrounded by Big Oil lobbyists, McCain is now embracing Bush's Exxon-Halliburton energy policy . Although a "megabucks" fundraiser with Midland Texas oilmen was postponed , $1.5 million in donations have already been pledged. Midland County GOP Chair Sue Brannon told the Midland Reporter-Telegram what will happen at the fundraiser: "When the 15 oilmen giving big time money meet with McCain, all we'll ask is that he be fair." The millions McCain is raising in Texas will be added to his impressive haul of oil industry cash this campaign season — 74 percent of his lifetime receipts:

Big Oil Contributions To Sen. McCain
1990 to 2008 cycle (April), Center for Responsive Politics, compiled by Center for American Progress Action Fund.

According to a Campaign Money Watch analysis of campaign finance data provided by the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics Center, John McCain and his leadership committee have accepted at least $1,069,854 from the oil and gas industry since 1989. Despite his mediagenic but inconstant opposition to drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, McCain's voting record on energy policy has been consistently friendly to Big Oil — and since his campaign for president began last year, he's been steadfast:

McCAIN'S RECORD OF CODDLING BIG OIL.

– McCain Voted Against Reducing Dependence on Foreign Oil. In 2005, McCain voted against legislation calling on the President to submit a plan to reduce foreign petroleum imports by 40 percent. [Senate Roll Call Vote #140, 6/16/05 ; DNC 6/22/07]

– Candidate McCain's "Zero" For Energy Future, Billions For Big Oil. Since launching his campaign for president in 2007, Sen. McCain has skipped out on every key environmental vote the Senate has considered, earning him a zero on the League of Conservation Voters scorecard this session. In one such instance, his absence killed the rollback of billions of dollars in oil subsidies for renewable energy investment. [LCV 2008]

– McCain's Absence Allows GOP to Filibuster Oil-For-Renewables. By a roll call vote of 59-40 on December 13, 2007, Senate Democrats failed to muster the 60 votes needed to prevent a filibuster threatened by Republicans of compromise energy legislation with an oil-for-renewable tax package. The tax package rolled back $12.7 billion in tax breaks on the oil and gas industry to invest in renewable energy tax credits. Sen. John McCain, on the campaign trail, was the one senator not voting. [CQ 12/12/07] [Vote #425 12/13/07]

–McCain's Tax Policies A Boon For Big Oil. Sen. McCain's plan to cut the corporate tax rate to 25 percent is worth $1.2 billion a year to Exxon Mobil alone. In addition, his plan includes a massive new corporate tax shelter. His call for a gas tax suspension would funnel money — about $11 billion — to oil refiners and producers. BIG OIL LOBBYISTS RUN McCAIN CAMPAIGN.

At least fourteen Big Oil lobbyists hold top positions in the McCain campaign, including his top adviser, Charlie Black.

– McCain's Senior Adviser Lobbies For Foreign Oil Interests. Charlie Black (lobbying firm: BKSH), McCain's senior campaign adviser, is a registered lobbyist for two Russian oil companies — Yukos Oil and Occidental International Corporation — and his lobbying firm was hired in 2005 by the China National Off-Shore Oil Corporation. [Roll Call 7/18/05, Senate Lobbying Disclosure Records]

– McCain's Campaign Liaison to Congress a Million-Dollar Big-Oil Lobbyist. John Green (Ogilvy Government Relations) — the "full-time liaison between McCain's presidential campaign and Republicans in the House and the Senate" — has made over $7.6 million dollars since 1999 lobbying for petro-industry giants such as Amerada-Hess, Chevron Texaco, the American Petroleum Institute, Reliant Energy, PJM Interconnection and First Energy. [Politico 3/4/08 , Senate Lobbying Disclosure Records]

– Fossil Fuel Lobbyists Everywhere in the McCain Campaign. Frank Donatelli, McCain's RNC liaison to the Republican Party, has lobbied for ExxonMobil, Dominion, and Eastman Chemical. Jerry Kilgore, co-chairman of McCain's Virginia campaign, has lobbied for Shell Oil and coal company Alpha Natural Resources. Nancy Pfotenhauer, a policy adviser and spokeswoman, has lobbied for Koch Industries. [Washington Post 3/12/08 , O'Dwyer's 8/9/06 , Media Matters 2/26/08 , Senate Lobbying Disclosure Records]

UPDATE: At Climate Progress , Joe Romm suggests questions for reporters to ask McCain. Confused, Marc Ambinder writes, "I am NOT an expert here; maybe I'm missing something, so feel free to read me in, as they say. But hasn't McCain already endorsed mandatory emissions caps?"

At Liberal Oasis Bill Scher explains: "He wants to tell moderates that he has a serious plan for our government to act against global warming. And he wants to tell conservatives that no government action will be involved. It can't be done."

According to the Politico 's Jonathan Martin:

> The McCain campaign called to clarify his remarks. "John McCain was correctly reflecting his position, he just inadvertently said the word 'cap' instead of 'target,'" said spokesman Tucker Bounds.
> Today's comment was a response to a question about mandatory "targets" for renewable energy — McCain believes that a cap-and-trade system provides enough market incentive for investment in renewables. If that's the case (and many environmentalists would disagree), then mandatory targets wouldn't increased threats to national security, the disappearing middle class, the growing deficit, Social Security solvency, gun control, renewable energy, sentencing reform and more.

On the world stage, this president will have to work with foreign leaders in dealing with ISIS and other terrorists, climate change, the containment of nuclear threats posed in North Korea and Iran, the Russian incursions in Ukraine and foreign trade.

The presidency is not an entry-level position. Whoever is sworn into office next January must demonstrate not only a deep understanding of the issues facing America, but also possess the diplomatic skills that enable presidents to forge alliances to get things done.

By that measure, Democrats have one outstanding candidate deserving of their support: Hillary Clinton. No other candidate can match the depth or breadth of her knowledge and experience.

As first lady, she worked tirelessly on health care reform and, with bipartisan support, created the Children's Health Insurance Program that provides coverage for 8 million children.

As a senator, she reached across party lines and joined forces with conservatives, including Sen. Lindsey Graham and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to fight for job creation and universal health care.

RELATED:A history of Register caucus endorsements

As secretary of state, she helped secure international sanctions against Iran and redefined her job by expanding America's diplomatic agenda to include poverty, women's rights, the environment and other issues.

She is not a perfect candidate, as evidenced the way she has handled the furor over her private email server. In our endorsement of her 2008 campaign for president, we wrote that "when she makes a mistake, she should just say so." That appears to be a lesson she has yet to fully embrace.

Her changing stance on gay marriage, immigration and other issues has invited accusations that she is guided less by personal conviction than by political calculations. She refutes that, and argues persuasively that a willingness to change one's thinking on specific issues, while remaining true to what she calls "the same values and principles," is a virtue, one lacking in most politicians.

Over the course of two meetings, Clinton spent more than three hours with the editorial board, answering questions in a direct and forthright manner. She exhibited an impressive command of the issues, though we'd have liked to hear more from her on the debt and the future of Social Security. She was somewhat prickly and defensive when discussing her emails, but overall she was gracious, engaging and personable.

Her chief opponent for the nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has proven to be an honorable and formidable campaigner, and it's very likely that without him in the race, candidates in both parties wouldn't be discussing America's growing inequality in wealth and income.

Sanders has tapped into the public's anger and frustration with Washington, without demonizing government and resorting to the cheap demagoguery favored by Donald Trump and others. He has shown himself to be a man of courage and principle who has the ability to rally others to his cause.

But Sanders admits that virtually all of his plans for reform have no chance of being approved by a Congress that bears any resemblance to the current crop of federal lawmakers. This is why, he says, voters can't simply elect him president, but must instead spark a "political revolution."

Easier said than done. Congress has the largest Republican majority since the 71st Congress of 1929-31.

A successful Sanders presidency would hinge on his ability to remake Washington in his own image. It's almost inconceivable that such a transformation could take place, even with Democrats controlling both chambers of Congress.

As for Martin O'Malley, the data-driven, wonkish former Maryland governor who has gained little traction in the campaign so far, he seems better suited to a Cabinet-level job in a Clinton White House.

In the final analysis, Iowa Democrats will have to choose between the lofty idealism of Bernie Sanders and the down-to-earth pragmatism of Hillary Clinton. For some, this will be a choice of whether to vote with their hearts or their heads.

Clinton has demonstrated that she is a thoughtful, hardworking public servant who has earned the respect of leaders at home and abroad. She stands ready to take on the most demanding job in the world.

Subject: Putin in Cuba, Groundhog Day in America

Having trouble viewing this message? Click Here

July 11, 2014

Dear Friends:

As Russian President Vladimir Putin visits Havana, and builds closer ties with Cuba's senior leadership, it begs the question, "Haven't we seen this movie before?"

Our six-decade stalemate with Cuba started at the height of the Cold War. Cuba established formal diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union on May 8, 1960. Washington, in turn, severed ties with Havana on January 3, 1961. By the time Vladimir Putin was a ten-year-old and Barack Obama was an infant, we had already lived through the Cuban Missile Crisis, the establishment of the Lourdes signals intelligence center near Havana, and more, which brought the heat of the Cold War within a hundred miles of our shores.

Back then, the Eisenhower and Kennedy Administrations decided it just would not do to have what was called a "Soviet puppet" in what some still call our "backyard." President Kennedy, as Cuba scholar Daniel Erikson wrote , reinterpreted the Monroe Doctrine "to support American efforts to contain the expansion of Soviet influence into the hemisphere."

From the Bay of Pigs invasion to diplomatic isolation to the tightest economic sanctions imposed on Cuba, driving the Soviets out and punishing the Cubans for inviting them in has been what U.S. policy was all about. This was matched, year after year, by Cuba's resolute resistance to whatever wallops Washington delivered, sustained for a decade by Soviet subsidies.

The fall of the Berlin Wall led, ultimately, to the collapse of Cuba's economy. When the Soviet Union broke-up in 1991, Cuba lost annual assistance estimated at approximately $4.5 billion. Its economy contracted by 35% more or less overnight. Public transport essentially ground to a halt. Calorie consumption in the average Cuban's diet fell 30%. Export earnings fell 80%. By January 1, 1992, when the Soviets cut off all military and economic assistance to Cuba, the allies had gone through a nasty break-up.

This was the moment to declare victory. With Russia dislodged from Cuba, the U.S. could have reinvigorated diplomacy and reached a modus vivendi with Cuba. The objectives of our Cold War era policy having been satisfied, we could have even brought some long overdue tranquility to our relationships in Latin America.

Instead, U.S. policymakers decided to try and finish the job, passing the Cuba Democracy Act, which tightened the embargo screws even further, with the expectation that Cuba's economic travails would do Cuba's government in. It could have been called "The Never Miss an Opportunity to Miss an Opportunity Act of 1992."

What happened? Well, Cuba's government didn't fall under the weight of the U.S. embargo. Raúl and Fidel Castro organized a peaceful transition of power. Our insistence on shutting Cuba out of regional forums like the OAS backfired on us. Now, a little more than two decades later, Russia is back.

Without apparent irony, Yuri Ushakov, a presidential aide, told a reporter that the Kremlin considers Cuba to be "one of Russia's ancient partners in Latin America." To advance that partnership, even before President Putin landed on Cuban soil, Russia agreed to write off about $32 billion in debt Cuba owed to the Soviet Union.

This is a big deal. The Voice of Russia news service references one analyst, Caroline Kennedy (no, we're not kidding), Head of the School of Politics, Philosophy, and International Studies at the University of Hull, as it observed, "the writing-off of the historic debt is about trying to reinvigorate a relationship that had fallen into abeyance in the 1990s - something Putin himself has said that he regrets in recent speeches."

In addition to writing off Cuba's debt, Russia has been written into Cuba's strategy for recovering oil from the vast offshore reserves it has sought to exploit in the deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico since the 1990s. As Bloomberg reports, during Putin's visit, two Russian state oil producers "plan to sign an agreement with Cuban company Cupet SA to carry out joint operations in Cuba's offshore areas."

It might interest you to know that on Putin's last trip to Cuba fourteen years ago, he pulled the plug on the Lourdes signal intelligence center as his personal affirmation that the Cold War was over, a gesture he believed was snubbed and, as Progreso Weekly reported, he also reviewed the status of Cuba's backlogged debt payments for previously acquired Soviet loans.

We have seen this movie before. It's called "Groundhog Day." In that film, history on February 2nd repeats itself day after day until our love-smitten, TV weatherman sets aside his self-destructive behavior and ends the tragic time loop by repairing his relationships and doing right in the world. The cold of winter gives way, finally, to spring.

"Keep in mind that when Castro came to power," President Obama said last year in Miami, "I was just born. So the notion that the same policies that we put in place in 1961 would somehow still be as effective as they are today in the age of the Internet and Google and world travel doesn't make sense."

Whether it's inviting Cuba to join the Summit of the Americas, engaging with Cuba directly to protect the coast of Florida from the potential risk posed by a Ruso-Cuban drilling accident, or using his ample executive authority to go bolder and deeper, surely President Obama can summon the imagination and courage, not to drive Russia out, but to get our country back in the game.

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

U.S. finally ends AeroMartí program

The AeroMartí program, an aircraft-based television broadcast system, which tried and failed to circumvent the jamming of TV Martí of by Cuba's government, was quietly ended in April after seven years of operation, reports Foreign Policy . The cost of the program exceeded $35 million.

The demise of the program was first noted in the July 2014 Inspection of the Office of Cuba Broadcasting report , released Monday by the U.S. Department of State and the Broadcasting Board of Governors (BBG).

The work-around itself failed, because Cuba's government jammed the plane's transmissions. Even though the plane was grounded and stored in a warehouse in rural Georgia, hardliners in Congress such as Senator Robert Menendez (NJ), Senator Marco Rubio (FL), Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (FL-27), and Rep. Mario Díaz-Balart (FL-25) insisted that AeroMartí be maintained at an annual cost of $79,524, so the plane could be ready to return to the air in the unlikely event that Cuba's government were to reverse course and stop jamming the signal as it has done since the 1990s. According to the report, Congress finally heeded repeated requests by the BBG to end a costly program that had failed to achieve its goals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In other findings, the report documents:

- Staff complaints that the director of the Office of Cuba Broadcasting (OCB) holds town hall meetings, but engages in one-way communications, and that questions are not allowed;
- Staff complaints that the acting general manager disempowers employees, prevents them from making decisions, and has them simply follow orders;
- Deployment of an OCB product, Piramideo, discussed by Tracy Eaton here , "which is an SMS-based social network that makes it easier for people inside Cuba to share information and connect with one another" outside of the government's control; and,
- Normal procedures for contracting, purchasing equipment, and paying for travel were not followed, which allowed the acting general manager to run up excess costs for airfare between offices in Washington and Miami, his residence in Los Angeles and other West Coast locations.

The BBG continues to produce programming for Radio Martí and TV Martí, launched in 1985 and 1990 respectively. Collectively, the U.S. government has spent more than $500 million on Martí programming to date. The BBG plans to bring Martí programming to Cubans in new ways including through DVDs, flash drives, satellites, and smartphone applications.

U.S. and Cuba hold biannual migration talks, discuss Alan Gross

Cuban and U.S. officials met in Washington, D.C. on Wednesday for biannual discussions of the 1994 and 1995 U.S.-Cuba Migration Accords, reports the Associated Press . The accords require the governments of the United States and Cuba "to promote safe, legal, and orderly migration between Cuba and the United States."

Alex Lee, Deputy Assistant Secretary at the State Department's Bureau of Western Hemisphere Affairs, and Josefina Vidal, Director General for U.S. Affairs at Cuba's Foreign Ministry, co-led these most recent talks. The meetings halted in 2011, the year that USAID subcontractor Alan Gross was convicted in Cuba, and resumed in 2013.

According to a statement by Cuba's Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MINREX), the officials discussed "actions carried out by the parties, both individually and collectively, to combat illegal migration, human smuggling and the falsification of migration documents." As it has before, MINREX called on the United States to eliminate the Cuban Adjustment Act, which expedites citizenship for Cubans who arrive in the U.S. legally or illegally. The Latin American Herald Tribune reports that about 1.5 million of the 2 million Cubans living abroad reside in the United States.

The AP reports that, in addition to issues of migration, the countries' officials discussed Alan Gross, human rights violations on the island, U.S. fugitives who have fled to Cuba and the renewal of direct mail services between the two countries. The State Department emphasized in its statement that at the talks, the U.S. "reiterated its call for the release of Alan Gross."

The State Department reminded the public that the talks are "routine" and should not be considered any indication of a new outlook on relations with Cuba.

Senator Menendez accuses Cuba of smear plot against him

Senator Robert Menendez (NJ) has accused Cuba's government of spreading a 2012 story that he paid underage prostitutes for sex in the Dominican Republic and is asking the U.S. Justice Department to investigate the alleged plot to smear him, reports the Washington Post . The Associated Press reports that Senator Menendez believes Cuba's government may also have had a role in allegations that led to an ongoing federal investigation of the Senator's ties to Dr. Salomon Melgen, a Dominican ophthalmologist who is being investigated for Medicare fraud. However, MSNBC reports that after speaking to numerous intelligence officials, it has found no credible evidence linking Cuba's government to the story.

Senator Menendez, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and one of the strongest supporters of the U.S. embargo against Cuba, believes that the story, which broke right before the November 2012 elections, came from Cuba's plot to prevent his re-election. As Menendez said to the AP:

> "To the extent [Cuba would] like to see the United States engage them more on their terms, which is not to observe democracy and human rights, they probably feel that I'm the single most significant impediment to their goals."

The federal government is still examining whether Menendez received donations in return for doing political favors for Dr. Melgen. In April 2014, Menendez's lawyer, Stephen M. Ryan, sent a letter to the Justice Department asking for an investigation. CNN calls this latest move by Menendez's legal team a "legal Hail Mary" meant to complicate the current federal probe of the Senator.

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

Vladimir Putin and Xi Jinping visit Cuba

Russian President Vladimir Putin and Chinese President Xi Jinping will both visit Cuba as part of larger tours of Latin America scheduled around the 6th annual BRICS Summit in Brazil -- a meeting of the leaders of five emerging international economies: Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa -- report RIA Novosti and Progreso Weekly .

Putin visits Cuba July 11 before attending the BRICS Summit and Xinping will visit Cuba -- as well as Venezuela and Argentina -- after the Summit. At the BRICS Summit, which will take place July 14-16, Putin will attend the BRICS-Latin American Leaders' Dialogue Forum. Jinping will meet with members of the Community of Latin American and Caribbean States (CELAC) while in Brazil.

In Cuba, Putin and President Raúl Castro will reportedly discuss "developing trade, economic and investment ties, and implementing joint projects in energy, transport, civil aviation, peaceful use of outer space, and healthcare," according to a Kremlin press release. The press release anticipates the two leaders will sign several bilateral accords. Putin will also meet with former President Fidel Castro. This will be his first visit to Cuba in 14 years, reports Progreso Weekly .

Putin's trip follows a strengthening of ties between Cuba and Russia in recent months. In May , the two countries signed a cooperation agreement on security. Later that month , Cuba and Russia signed cooperation agreements allowing two Russian oil companies to drill offshore in Cuban waters in exchange for Cuban students studying at a Russian university.

Xi Jinping's visit to Cuba was preceded by Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi's Latin America tour in April, during which he met with Cuba's Foreign Minister, Bruno Rodríguez Parrilla. China is Cuba's second most important economic ally after Venezuela, reports AFP .

Russia to forgive 90% of Cuba's debt

On Wednesday, Russia's Federation Council cancelled 90% of Cuba's $35.2 billion debt to Russia for loans Cuba received when Russia was part of the Soviet Union, The Moscow Times reports. The agreement was passed by Russia's Duma last Friday, the same day that Putin's trip to Cuba was announced. Cuba will have to pay Russia back 10% of its loans, about $3.5 billion, over a period of ten years beginning on October 25, 2014, reports Progreso Weekly . Russia will reinvest the payments it receives from Cuba into Russian projects in Cuba.

While Russia historically has argued that Cuba owed this money since the Soviet era, Cuba's government has made the case that the Russian Federation should have compensated Cuba after breaking bilateral relations in the 1990s and the privation that followed during what became known as the "Special Period."

In an interview on Thursday with Prensa Latina and Itar-Tass , Cuban and Russian state news agencies respectively, Putin detailed the type of cooperation he would like to see between Russia and Cuba in the future. He said that Russian businesses that specialize in "manufacturing metal and plastic products, spare parts for cars, in tractor assembly and in assembly of heavy equipment for the rail industry" were interested in investing in the Special Economic Zone at Mariel, and added that the two countries hope to establish a transportation exchange through Mariel Port and by constructing an international airport at San Antonio de los Baños in Cuba.

Tourism continues to rise in Cuba: first six months of 2014 see 4.6% increase

The number of tourists traveling to Cuba in the first six months of 2014 was up by 4.6% over the same period last year, the Latin American Herald Tribune reports. This increase amounts to a total of 1.67 million foreign tourists traveling to Cuba during the first half of the year. In May , Cuba's National Office of Statistics and Information (ONEI) found that 60,000 more tourists traveled to Cuba from January-April 2014 than during those months in 2013.

Container terminal at Mariel Port handles 57 ships

Fifty-seven ships have used the container terminal at Mariel Port in the six months since it opened , amounting to a total of 15,000 containers, reports EFE . According to the report, the terminal has the capacity to handle up to 822,000 containers per year.

President Raúl Castro signed legislation authorizing the creation of the Special Economic Development Zone at Mariel Port in September 2013 . The Special Zone is meant to connect Cuba internationally, encourage foreign investment to boost Cuba's lagging economy, and provide employment opportunities for local Cubans. The project at Mariel Port, along with the Foreign Investment Law passed in March 2014 , is part of Cuba's recent effort to attract foreign investment. Cuba is currently considering 23 proposals for foreign investment in the Port.

President Raúl Castro assesses Cuba's economy

Last weekend, President Raúl Castro addressed the National Assembly in Havana and discussed the slow pace of economic progress in Cuba, reports the Associated Press .

As we reported two weeks ago, the government slashed its initial estimates for GDP growth in 2014 from 2.2% to 1.4%.

President Castro recognized in his 25-minute speech to the National Assembly that Cuba's economy was not improving as desired, but also insisted that the country is, in fact, taking the necessary precautions and 'appropriate gradualness' to ensure future economic stability and growth:

> "Gradualness is not a whim, much less a desire to delay the changes that we must make. On the contrary, it is about a need to ensure order and avoid gaps that would lead us directly to mistakes that distort the proposed objectives."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In acknowledging the "modest" improvement of Cuba's economy, President Castro cited the absence of "foreign revenue," "climatic conditions" and the "internal shortcomings" in the way Cuba's government regulates the economy, reports Havana Times . His speech also emphasized the need for a national "fighting spirit" and "optimism" in order to "reverse the situation and recover the rhythms of progress to ensure a socialist development on sustainable and irreversible foundations," reports Granma .

Cuba to increase customs restrictions in September

Starting in September 2014, Cuba's government will impose new restrictions on the goods it allows through customs, as well as a new customs tax, reports Café Fuerte . This policy is part of an effort to reduce the trafficking of goods sent by third parties into the country. The Resolution published by Cuba's customs office details regulations for 381 categories of items that those entering the country can declare for personal use.

Electronic and information goods will experience the most drastic limitations; in addition to cutting down the number of items allowed into the country, the new regulations say that in order to bring certain electronic technology into the country, travelers will need to obtain a letter from the Ministry of Communications. Goods that require explicit permission include wireless fax machines, switchboards, wireless microphones, routers, and walkie-talkies.

A reduced number of other goods, including food and clothing items, will be allowed into the country, though no letter will be required for them. In addition to these new regulations, travelers will have to pay an increased customs tariff in an unspecified amount and currency (Cuban pesos or CUC).

Official in charge of currency unification says it won't cause price increases

Marino Murillo, Vice President of Cuba's Council of Ministers and the man responsible for spearheading Cuba's economic reforms, stated on Saturday that the unification of the dual currency system will not have an adverse effect on the Cuban people's purchasing power, reports Havana Times . Though currently the exchange rate between the two currencies is 24 Cuban Pesos (CUP) to 1 Convertible Peso (CUC), the currency reform will eventually eliminate the CUC so that only the CUP remains in circulation.

Some Cubans who have savings in CUC are concerned about possible ramifications of currency reform, but Vice President Murillo insists that the end of dual currency "will have no effect" and will not cause prices to increase. While Vice President Murillo expressed support for this economic reform, he also recognized that unifying the two currencies will not solve all of Cuba's economic problems.

Minister of Agriculture announces reforms to boost agricultural productivity

At the National Assembly on July 4, Gustavo Rodríguez Rollero, Cuba's Minister of Agriculture, announced new reforms aimed at increasing the agricultural sector's productivity, reports EFE . The reforms will go into effect in three stages between now and the end of 2015. Changes include the elimination of 6,441 mostly administrative state jobs in the agricultural sector and the relaxation of some restrictions on cooperatives that "slow down agricultural development." These changes represent a 41% personnel reduction and are expected to save the government 15,067,007 Cuban pesos (CUP), reports El Mundo .

EFE reports that the government is also likely to eliminate UNA, a distributor of agricultural goods that acts as an intermediary between farmers and the agricultural market, which currently manages 378 markets. El Mundo reports that UNA is "inefficient and corrupt."

Days before the reforms were announced, Ulises Guilarte, Secretary General of the Workers' Central Union of Cuba, announced that Cuba was spending $2 billion annually on importing food, Cartas Desde Cuba reports. These reforms will try to make production within Cuba more efficient.

Rodríguez Rollero acknowledged in his presentation to the National Assembly that agricultural cooperatives, which employ 66% of agricultural workers, have the highest production levels in the agricultural sector. Marino Murillo, Vice President of Cuba's Council of Ministers, said that while almost a third of the land owned by the state lies fallow, 90% of the land owned by the private sector and the cooperatives is productive.

Schools to become more individualized under education reforms

In the coming school year, Cuba's Ministry of Education will implement reforms that will give individual schools more autonomy and better prepare teachers, the Latin American Herald Tribune reports. Minister of Education Ena Elsa Velázquez announced the reforms, adding that they were created with input from students, teachers, and officials.

According to the report, principals will now be able to structure the curricula and activities within their specific schools to best serve their particular communities. Velázquez said that while the education system will become more personalized under the reforms, schools still have to meet standards:

> "Flexibility does not mean that each school will do what it wants. The study plan must be respected and carried out with more rigor, and professors must ... prepare themselves better [so] that no class is left out."

The reforms also give teachers more time to prepare class material, add more vocational training classes for students, and emphasize increased communication between school councils and students' families. The Ministry of Education is also working on a long-term project to improve curricula and textbooks.

The status and quality of Cuba's educational system, a hallmark of the Cuban Revolution, has recently become a subject of debate on the island. In June, a scandal over exam cheating that led to eight arrests was reported by the Associated Press .

Cuba Posible* co-founders discuss their new publication

Roberto Veiga, the former editor of Espacio Laical, says that the purpose of his new publication, Cuba Posible, is to provide a space for debate, inclusive of many perspectives, that will help affect moderate change, reports El Toque . Last week , Veiga and his former co-editor Lenier González, who left Espacio Laical in May, announced that they would embark on a new project --Cuba Posible -- which is currently in very early stages.

El Toque reports that Veiga provided more details about their vision for the publication:

> "We will try not to make our project considered subversive, because it does not intend to dismantle anything, but rather complete a work. ... Many of the achievements of the Revolution are just but must be developed, because they are affected by the social and economic crisis. Additionally, there are other demands of society that have not been achieved, but pursuing them does not mean dismantling [the Revolution] but rather completing it."

In an interview with Global Voices , González discussed the project's goal of balance, saying that it will be a space for "channeling all opinions and proposals, for facilitating greater economic and social stability in the country."

Veiga described to Reuters why it is so important to him and González that the project remain moderate:

> "Cubans want a change, a big change, but generally they yearn for a change without disruption, change without confrontation, without annihilation. ... They want peaceful change within a process of inclusion."

El Toque reports that Cuba Posible currently remains unfunded and notes that this project, unlike Espacio Laical, will not be protected by the large Church institution. González strongly rejects rumors that he and Veiga are trying to form a political party. Rather, Veiga said they are responding to the needs of the Cuban people:

"A friend always tells us: if [José] Martí had to declare a 'Necessary War,' today we have to establish a Necessary Peace. The people of Cuba are tired of fighting and need progress and balance."

Subject: Agency Leads

John,

We'd like your feedback on two leadership roles in Agency teams.

1) A replacement (if any) for Sam Nunn on DOD. John Hamre was one of the names we'd discussed before in considering a more senior face to put on the DOD team as you desired. Do you want us to ask him or to develop other candidates, or have Bill Lynn and Michele Flournoy stay as co-leads?

2) James Loy cannot serve (conflict of interest) as co-lead of DHS with Randy Beers. Randy has proposed two candidates: John Gannon and John Gordon. While Susan and I would be fine with either, we do not know if either would do it.

John Gannon was to have led the pre-Nov 4 Intel/DHS transition but had a conflict of interest and time that led him to step away from the lead. John Gordon's business interests may similarly impede him from playing a role. We'd like your guidance regarding whether to proceed with seeking a co-lead for Randy and if so whether you have preferences.

An alternative model would be to have Randy lead and appoint a deputy -- perhaps Clark Kent Ervin (african american, former DHS counsel) or Ron Lee from NSA since he'd rather be on DHS. Please let us know your thoughts.

Thanks. -Sarah

Washington Post Opinion: Hillary Clinton's increasing comfort with being a female almost-candidate

By Ruth Marcus

October 10, 2014 7:19 p.m. EDT

The 2008 campaign was the first with a woman as a serious presidential contender, so it was not surprising that gender was an uncomfortable, tiptoe-y subject. The male candidates weren't sure-footed in dealing with it — recall Barack Obama's "you're likable enough, Hillary" and the debate discussion about the color of her jacket.

Neither, actually, was Clinton herself. Her campaign was never certain how, or even whether, to talk about gender. Often, it put the issue at arm's length. "I am very proud to be making history running as a woman for president of the United States," Clinton would say on the campaign trail, "but I'm not running because I am a woman."

Sometimes, under pressure, her campaign unnecessarily turned the gender card face up, as when, after a bruising debate in November 2007, her allies complained of six guys "piling on" the candidate— as if anyone ever thought of Clinton as a defenseless victim.

If the pre-campaign season is any indication — and, yes, I do think we are in pre-campaign season — this time could be interestingly different.

Clinton, like her party, is prepared to put issues of gender equality front and center; the preponderance of female voters and the Democrats' edge with them make that focus a no-brainer for candidates of both genders. "We talk about a glass ceiling," Clinton said at a forum on women's economic security at the Center for American Progress last month. "These women don't even have a secure floor under them."

More notable than the new focus on gender substance, though, may be Clinton's newfound comfort — or new degree of comfort — with being the female almost-candidate.

Witness Clinton's full-on embrace of grandma-hood, tweeting out pictures of her new granddaughter despite the twin potential pitfalls of gender andage. No one remarked on whether Mitt Romney's passel of grandkids made him seem old. (By the way, Clinton is seven months younger.) And no one questioned whether being a grandpa would diminish his zeal for the presidency.

You might call it sexist — except that Clinton herself has raised that possibility. "I know I have a decision to make," she told People magazine in June. "But part of what I've been thinking about, is everything I'm interested in and everything I enjoy doing — and with the extra added joy of 'I'm about to become a grandmother,' I want to live in the moment."

Just last week, though, baby Charlotte made her first appearance — in name, not in fact — on the campaign trail. Touting her "grandmother glow," Clinton, campaigning for Pennsylvania gubernatorial candidate Tom Wolf, noted that "there's a lot of Philadelphia and a lot of Pennsylvania in Charlotte. . . . Her father's already held her while watching the Eagles play."

And Charlotte is not just a cute prop — she serves a substantive point: That "you should not have to be the grandchild of a president" — or perhaps two presidents — "to get a good education, to get good health care. Let's make sure we give every child in Pennsylvania the same chance that I'm determined to give my granddaughter." Get ready to hear that line on the presidential campaign trail.

At the same time, Clinton seems looser, almost playful about gender in recent appearances. There she was at the Economic Club of Chicago earlier in the week describing how she tried to turn down Obama when he asked her to be secretary of state.

"In my discussions with him, after he offered me the job here in Chicago and I said no, and I said no again, and I said no again, and finally I just gave in," Clinton said. "And as I said to somebody the other day, I told my husband no and I wouldn't get married, and no, and just gave in. So . . . I have a history with charismatic, attractive men. They just wear me out."

Pretty edgy, with its coy, no-sometimes-means-yes connotations. Except that everybody understands that Clinton knows her mind; this girl is swept off her feet only when she's so inclined. No one hearing it would think, "Gee, if she can't say no to Barack Obama, how will she stand up to Vladimir Putin?" Clinton knows: Whatever criticisms she might encounter, not being tough enough won't be among them.

We saw some glimmerings of this Clinton in 2008, but her comfort level with gender, her willingness to engage in a bit of post-feminist flirtatiousness, seems greater now. The 2016 campaign could be the one that lets Hillary enjoy being a girl.

It was the document dump to end all document dumps.

Tens of thousands of pages of previously-secret files detailing the inner workings of the President Bill Clinton's White House as it struggled with then-first lady Hillary Clinton's high-profile failure on health care reform, as aides sought to manage a slew of actual or perceived scandals, and as the White House staff reeled from disclosure of the Monica Lewinsky affair.

However, the records released over eight months did little to fulfill the fevered imaginations of Clinton critics who pined for some revelation that would torpedo Hillary Clinton's chances to attempt a return to the White House through a presidential campaign of her own.

The papers show a White House unabashed in its desires to manipulate the media through selective leaks and carefully-chosen interviews. But they're also a reminder that many of the techniques the Clinton team innovated are now commonplace in the political arena.

The set of files posted Friday spilled secrets on the creation of the "don't ask, don't tell policy," heated controversies involving Whitewater and the White House Travel Office, and how White House aides encouraged the president to use a State of the Union address to defend his wife against Republican criticism.

Among the most notable disclosures Friday:

Gays in the military

A fly-on-the-wall view of an early meeting Bill Clinton held with the joint chiefs of staff over his pledge to reverse the ban on gays in the military. The closed-door session, held just five days after Clinton took office, featured a spirited back-and-forth about the policy.

Joint Chiefs Chairman Colin Powell and Vice President Al Gore faced off over whether the issue of gay rights was parallel to that of African Americans, the detailed notes show.

Powell declared that the comparison with blacks was "off-base" because race is a "benign" characteristic and "sexuality is" different.

Gore responded that he saw "some parallels" between discrimination against gays and African Americans and that a gay person kicked out of the military just for being gay "is discriminated against in a way similar to black[s,]" the notes show.

Marine Corps Commandant Carl Mundy, who died earlier this year, equated announcing "I'm gay" with declaring "I'm KKK, Nazi, rapist," the notes indicate.

Clinton suggested he was open to kicking some gays out of the military, even if they were identified through their advocacy. “People I would like to keep [in the military] wouldn’t show up at a Queer Nation parade,” the president said.

It’s unclear who took the 34-pages of richly-detailed notes, but National Archives notations indicated they came from the files of National Security Council staffer Richard Beardsworth.

Whitewater independent counsel

Notes detail opposition by both Bill and Hillary Clinton to the naming of an independent counsel to investigate their Whitewater investment.

One in a series of files pertaining to Whitewater contains a series of handwritten notes that appear to be minutes or a meeting or a survey of opinion. One entry, that appears to say “Mack” next to it, as in Chief of Staff Mack McLarty, reads, “Let’s get off whether we’ll have spcl pros or counsel, HRC + BC don’t want it.”

Militia group regulations

In the wake of the Oklahoma City bombing, the Clinton administration considered the possibility of aggressive new regulation of domestic militia groups, including publishing membership lists of such organization, requiring them to register with the federal government or to get permission before offering “paramilitary” training.

Some of the ideas were championed by Clinton adviser Dick Morris, who was known for advancing policy proposals that resonated well in polls.

“The public overwhelmingly supports a significant expansion in the FBI’s ability to investigate militia groups. If you and the Justice Department believe such an expansion would be in the public interest, I would recommend that we go ahead with it with a high profile announcement,” Morris wrote in an Oct. 6, 1995, memo to Chief of Staff Leon Panetta, as well as Deputy Chiefs of Staff Erskine Bowles and Harold Ickes.

The proposals seem to have produced widespread alarm in the administration, among Justice Department officials, White House lawyers and even other political advisers. Some worried that even reducing the proposals to writing could provoke a backlash from conservatives already wary of the federal government following high-profile showdowns at Ruby Ridge, Idaho and Waco, Texas.

“The Justice Department has stopped working on the terrorism question. They say this is because [White House Counsel Ab Mikva] instructed them that this is not information that should be on paper,” wrote Clinton White House aide Jennifer O’Connor. She’s now back at the White House, working in President Barack Obama’s counsel’s office after serving as a crisis-response lawyer handling problems at the Internal Revenue Service and with the roll-out of Obamacare.

O’Connor wrote that Mikva concluded “politically, the ideas we talked about are really bad ideas.”

“All of the lawyers analyzing these proposals (in this office and at DOJ) strongly believe it is a serious mistake—as a policy but especially as a political matter to impose militia controls of the type now being discussed, even if they would be constitutional," Mikva and others wrote, warning that measures already announced had prompted "an unprecedented alliance" between the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Rifle Association.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We worry that further proposals of the type being discussed could be depicted in very menacing terms to average citizens and could tip the political balance against the President," Mikva added.

Behind closed doors

The records also offer colorful, behind-the-scenes glimpses of Bill Clinton's candor with aides. One document shows a side of Clinton rarely seen in public as he spoke frankly about what could and could not be in his 1999 State of the Union speech.

"We can't go around and bash the s out of all these people using child labor to produce all these cheap manufacturing projects and say, but we can't sign this convention because we want to keep the Mexican children working on our farms," he said during a discussion of child labor.

His remarks, peppered with profanity, sounded notes of humor and impatience, and underscored his desire to make the speech accessible.

"If I were listening to this pension thing, I wouldn't know what in the living hell we were talking about," Clinton said.

He also said one draft of the speech spent too much time on Saddam Hussein.

"It looks like we are obsessed with Saddam Hussein," he said. "I mean, it looks like, Jesus, he's the only guy we ever think about. There's a whole world out there."

An affair to remember

One former Clinton aide, speechwriter Lowell Weiss, sent a colleague a magazine article he wrote summing up the love-hate relationship many White House staffers have with their jobs.

"It has been said, accurately I think, that working in the White House is like dating the hottest woman (or man) you've ever seen," Weiss observed. "You know the relationship can't last. You know it's not healthy for you. But man, it's hard to give up."

Previously secret documents

The legal authority relied on to withhold the Clinton Library records made public on Friday and earlier this year expired in January 2013, 12 years after Clinton left office. However, none of the records were released until February of this year, after POLITICO reported that the long-secret files were in limbo.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The records releases have been closely watched by political operatives and journalists alike since the files could shed light on Hillary Clinton's White House activities and fuel questions she faces about aspects of her record as she prepares for a possible bid for the presidency.

Three days after POLITICO inquired with President Barack Obama's White House in February about why none of the so-called previously withheld records had been released, White House lawyer David Sandler emailed the Archives, approving the release of thousands of pages of documents, records obtained under the Freedom of Information Act show.

The very next day, Clinton representative Bruce Lindsey signed off on disclosing the same batch of records — a trove so large that it has taken the library months to organize and post online.

Either Obama or Clinton could have moved to prevent disclosure of some of the records. Despite the lengthy review process, neither did, according to an Archives spokeswoman.

However, the release Friday of the final set of previously restricted records does not mean all the Clinton-era White House records are now available for public view. Far from it.

Tens of millions of pages and millions of emails have yet to be processed by archivists. In addition, some of the records that have been processed remain off-limits to the public on national security or privacy grounds. It also appears that some legal advice given to the Clintons has been deemed to be personal records, not covered by the Presidential Records Act. Records related solely to political matters have also been put off-limits under the same rationale.

Time: "Hillary Clinton's Burden of History"

By Zeke J. Miller

[Subtitle:] Everything old is new again for the Clintons, as documents reveal White House secrets.

Buried in the 10,000 pages of documents released by the Clinton Presidential Library Friday is one bearing the customized stamp "Document Produced To Independent Counsel."

Created to help track the untold number of documents produced for independent counsel Ken Starr's investigations of the Clintons, the stamp is a totem of the problem that has dogged Hillary Clinton since she ran for the U.S. Senate in 2000: her history.

The Library made the documents available Friday, completing the release of 30,000 pages of previously restricted White House records on everything from the failed HillaryCare push to the Monica Lewinsky scandal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those controversies generated internal debates and gotcha-moments now bearing out 14 years after the former First Lady and her husband vacated the White House, complicating her bid to be a repeat occupant.

Deliberations over Supreme Court appointments, controversial pardons, and meetings with foreign leaders are bared for the world to see. Even personal feuds, like that between the former president and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, are on display in the margins of official documents and notes to staff. To read the document trove is to reenter a White House at the center of political and personal maelstroms.

The stamped memo captures the mid-1990s Clinton White House at a peak of high drama. Written by Deputy White House Counsel Bruce Lindsay to prepare President Bill Clinton for an interview on the Whitewater scandals, it strikes a familiar chord for those who view the former president as deceptive and those who view him as unfairly besieged by enemies. “NOTE: Of course, it is strongly recommended that you not answer specific factual questions about Whitewater, using the appointment of a special counsel as a legitimate way to deflect questions.”

Other documents reveal Hillary Clinton’s distaste for the press, her staff’s attempts to crack down on internal leaks, and the influence of donors in the White House. Ultimately, the documents, with an audience of Washington politicos, appear neither good nor bad for Clinton as she moves towards a run for the White House in 2016. Many simply reveal another perspective of issues well-covered twenty years ago. As much as anything else does, they simply define who she is and where she’s come from, even as she contemplates a new chapter in her life.

Conventional wisdom holds that longtime Senators with equally long voting records have a harder time running for the White House than governors do, a problem that Clinton has on steroids. Unending media interest in her and her husband, a sped-up news cycle, and the country’s increasingly short attention span have made even old news of interest as Clinton looks to 2016. Republicans will try to use these documents to revive the “Clinton Fatigue” that plagued the couple’s last years in office and cast a tall shadow over her failed 2008 presidential bid.

But Clinton will benefit some, too. The documents are proof of her intimate involvement in nearly every aspect of professional Washington for more than two decades. They show the Clintons and their aides tangling with complicated policy challenges, and reveal them slowly developing skills to manage the national media amid scandal.

Ultimately, the greatest challenge Clinton faces in the documents may not be answering for past political maneuvers or the snide remarks of aides, but finding a way to simply leave the past behind.

House on Friday, with topics including Hillary Rodham Clinton's ill-fated attempt as first lady to overhaul the health care system.

Previous disclosures often shed new light on elements of the Clinton presidency, including the administration's scrambles after the Republicans won control of the House in 1994 and after the Monica Lewinsky scandal began to envelop the White House in 1998.

The latest disclosures are posted on the website of the William J. Clinton Library.

A First Lady Plots Her Own Political Path

In the fall of 1999, Mrs. Clinton's staff faced a unique challenge: Figuring out how a sitting first lady could explore a run for the United States Senate. Should Mrs. Clinton's exploratory campaign committee or taxpayers pay for her trips to New York? What if she meets with United Nations officials and attends a fund-raiser?

The conclusion: The government would pay travel costs of Secret Service agents, the White House photographer, doctors and personal aides when Mrs. Clinton traveled to New York; the campaign would pay for travel of any aides related to her run for Senate.

The math over how to split these costs was broken down in excruciating detail in these memos. A trip to Binghamton, N.Y., and New York City included "43 percent official; 22 percent exploratory committee; 36 percent political," read one memo from the first lady's office.

The memos highlight the untraditional tenure of Mrs. Clinton, whose political ambition and policy involvement often overshadowed the traditional role of a first lady.

Mrs. Clinton's role in overseeing the secretive Health Care Task Force prompted a lawsuit over whether the first lady was a private citizen or a public official. (A United States Court of Appeals declared the first lady to be a government official exempt from some disclosure requirements.)

The attempt at a health care overhaul represented a trial by fire for Mrs. Clinton, who was accused of overseeing a secretive and dysfunctional task force led by an aide, Ira Magaziner.

In a memo dated April 1995, Mr. Magaziner explains in detail his efforts to persuade the news media to report more positively on the failed task force, including a list of names of Clinton aides whom he believed to be sources on articles critical of the president and first lady's efforts at a health care overhaul.

"I seethe inside when I think of how disloyal some administration officials have been to you and the president and how hurtful they have been to me in their private discussions with the press," Mr. Magaziner wrote to Mrs. Clinton.

After a Suicide, a Cryptic Note From the President

One of the most intriguing documents released on Friday is an otherwise blank sheet of paper with a cryptic note in President Clinton's familiar left-hand scrawl.

The paper is dated June 14, 1994. "H.R.C.," it says, using the initials for Hillary Rodham Clinton. "What did we ever decide to do on this?" And then it is signed, "B.C."

Whatever "this" was is not mentioned. The paper was in a file marked "Vince Foster," referring to the longtime friend of Mrs. Clinton who came from Arkansas to serve as White House deputy counsel but then committed suicide. The day before the date marked on the document, both Mr. and Mrs. Clinton were interviewed by Robert Fiske, the independent counsel then looking into Mr. Foster's death.

Managing a Sex Scandal

On March 26, 1996, a young White House aide sent an email message up the chain of command. "This is an official request to hang the picture of President Clinton signing the telecomm bill in our office," the aide wrote. It was signed, "Thank you. Monica Lewinsky."

A month later, the young Ms. Lewinsky would be banished from the White House, dispatched to the nether regions of the administration by presidential advisers trying to protect the president. "Our direction is to make sure she has a job in an agency," Patsy Thomasson, the deputy White House personnel director, wrote in a message. "We are working toward that end."

The ultimately tragicomic White House tenure of Ms. Lewinsky echoes through some of the documents released on Friday. In hundreds of pages related to the scandal that would, to her everlasting chagrin, forever bear her name, Ms. Lewinsky is largely an off-screen character discussed endlessly by all the other players, with her own voice coming through in just that single banal, one-sentence request.

Also missing from the file are the voices of two other protagonists, Mr. and Mrs. Clinton. But the papers pull back the curtain a bit on the frenzied efforts by the people around them to deal with the burgeoning political furor touched off by the president's sexual liaison with Ms. Lewinsky that would lead to his impeachment by the House and acquittal by the Senate.

According to the papers, Mr. Clinton received a letter from Keith Olbermann, who had left sportscasting to become a political broadcaster, apologizing for "whatever part I may have played in perpetuating this ceaseless coverage" and promising to leave the news business and head "back to my previous career in sports as quickly as possible."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A note drafted for Mr. Clinton to send in reply had the president saying, “I’m grateful you got in touch with me, and I send you my very best wishes.”

White House aides debated whether to forgive others they deemed complicit in fanning the flames. Mickey Ibarra, a White House aide, wrote about speaking with Gov. Parris Glendening of Maryland after he criticized Mr. Clinton. “I delivered our message (it does not help any of us to pile on),” Mr. Ibarra wrote.

When the radio host Tom Joyner made comments on his show that irritated Clinton aides, one sent a message saying they should remember that the next time he asked for an interview. Another countered that Mr. Joyner was mostly on the president’s side and besides they would need him in the future. “Politics baby!!!!!” the aide wrote.

Sidney Blumenthal, a White House adviser close to Mrs. Clinton, wrote a series of messages aimed at undercutting key players in the episode. He referred to “the plotters” who were promoting the scandal and called the journalist Michael Isikoff, then of Newsweek, a “coconspirator.”

He suggested that Linda Tripp, who taped Ms. Lewinsky talking about her relationship with the president and then turned over the recordings to the independent counsel Kenneth W. Starr, may have falsified talking points she said Ms. Lewinsky had given her. If so, Mr. Blumenthal wrote, “Tripp would be a liar, a worthless witness and open to prosecution herself for lying to F.B.I. investigators.”

As for Lucianne Goldberg, the literary agent who helped Ms. Tripp bring the original accusations to Mr. Isikoff at Newsweek, Mr. Blumenthal sent a message to the reporter David Corn questioning her integrity. In the message, Mr. Blumenthal wrote that Ms. Goldberg had been sued by the author Kitty Kelley “for stealing a lot of money from her” and suggested Mr. Corn call Ms. Kelley. “Do you want Kitty’s phone number?” he asked. “I think she’d talk on background.”

Also evident in the files is a certain resignation by Clinton aides mystified by the whole episode. Paul Begala, the longtime Clinton strategist, wrote to a White House aide in 1999 looking for help in coming up with lines for an event to be presided over by the NBC journalist Tim Russert. Mr. Begala wanted to be prepared for what he presumed would be the line of questioning.

“Russert asked me 13 times in one interview what the president’s relationship with Monica Lewinsky was,” Mr. Begala wrote, trying out a line. “Hell, I don’t even know what his relationship with Al Gore is.”

Damage Control Over Whitewater Deal

More than 1,000 pages of the documents released on Friday concern the Whitewater investigation in the mid-1990s of an Arkansas real estate deal involving the first couple. Among the legal opinions, talking points and chronologies in the documents are many memos focused on how to portray the Clintons in the most favorable light.

• An unsigned memo for the president from March 1994, titled “Key Points on Whitewater for Press Conference,” said, “You and Hillary have done nothing wrong. This whole affair involves an unsuccessful investment in a minor real estate deal nearly 16 years ago. Defend H.R.C. Stress her ethics and accomplishments as a lawyer and in doing public service work. A person whose life and career have exemplified highest ethical standards and integrity.

• In another memo written that same month, a political adviser, Paul Begala, urged the Clintons to do a joint interview on primetime television. “They must be relaxed, open and forthcoming. Any sense of bitterness, anger or righteous indignation will not work,” he wrote. “A word about interaction: Mandy observes that in many joint interviews, the president defers to the first lady. This may or may not be real, and it might be as simple as Southern manners, but it’s important that the president take the lead on this issue.”

• A January 1995 memo suggests that a “Whitewater Team” be formed, the purpose of which would be to “develop and implement a coherent offensive and defensive White House strategy for responding to inquiries directed at the character of the president or Mrs. Clinton.” The proposed team was to include more than a dozen people, including lawyers, press assistants and a researcher. “The team’s central focus will be issues that involve direct challenges to the character of the president or Mrs. Clinton,” the memo said.

Last-Minute Pleas for Clemency

In his final days in office, President Bill Clinton and his staff were being lobbied by a host of friends arguing for pardons or other executive clemency, including one of his former lawyers, a former president and a future adviser to the current president.

But none of the documents released on Friday warned him of the firestorm that would erupt with his last-minute acts of clemency.

The most controversial of the pardons eventually issued went to the financier Marc Rich, and the documents include a letter from Dec. 19, 2000, about Mr. Rich that was sent to a Clinton aide, Bruce Lindsey, by a former White House counsel, Jack Quinn. In the letter, Mr. Quinn cited a conversation with Mr. Lindsey while in Belfast about the pardon request for Mr. Rich, his client.

“You expressed a concern that they are fugitives; and I told you they are not,” Mr. Quinn wrote, referring to Mr. Rich and Pincus Green, his partner. Mr. Quinn went on to explain that Mr. Rich and Mr. Green were living in Switzerland when they were indicted in 1983. So rather than fleeing the indictments they simply “chose not to return to the U.S. for a trial.”

“Their failure to return to New York was not a crime, and no one has ever accused them of a crime for failing to come to the U.S. for a trial,” Mr. Quinn wrote.

The letter came just a few days after Mr. Quinn sent a handwritten note to Mr. Lindsey. “I am told that Barak also raised the Marc Rich matter with the president, as has at least one other person who was told that you and I should discuss it,” Mr. Quinn wrote in that note, referring to Ehud Barak, then the Israeli prime minister.

In another plea, former President Jimmy Carter and his wife, Rosalynn, weighed in on behalf of two inmates on death row, Juan Raul Garza and David Paul Hammer, arguing that Mr. Clinton should spare them because of problems with the application of capital punishment in America.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Renewing federal executions under these circumstances would undermine your lifelong commitment to equal justice at home,” they wrote.

And Harold Hongju Koh, then the assistant secretary of state for democracy, human rights and labor who would go on to become President Obama’s top State Department legal adviser for a time, also wrote the White House about Mr. Garza, who was then scheduled to be the first federal inmate executed in nearly 40 years.

Mr. Koh advocated a moratorium on federal executions because of evidence of racial disparity in the justice system. “One of President Clinton’s greatest legacies will be his commitment to racial justice and equality,” Mr. Koh wrote. A moratorium “would reaffirm that legacy.”

In the end, Mr. Clinton pardoned Mr. Rich and Mr. Green. He postponed Mr. Garza’s execution, but the convict was put to death in June 2001 after President George W. Bush refused to grant clemency.

Mr. Hammer’s execution was postponed and his death sentence was later overturned by a judge because the prosecution had withheld statements that might have helped him. He was resentenced to life in prison, a sentence reaffirmed this summer.

Was Bill Clinton a Trekkie?

The revelation of presidential affair with a young aide would be a public relations nightmare for any White House, but some aides kept a sense of humor about it in their correspondence.

Mr. Clinton was preparing for a news conference in 1999 a week before an interview Ms. Lewinsky gave to Barbara Walters was set to air. Anticipating that reporters would ask the president whether he planned to watch the interview, James Kennedy, a White House spokesman, passed along a suggested response to his colleague, Amy Weiss.

Mr. Kennedy wrote that Mr. Clinton should say, “I have already expressed my regret for what she and others have had to go through because of things I have said and done. I wish her well in whatever she does.”

But that was not Mr. Kennedy’s original idea. He first thought about letting Mr. Clinton say bluntly that he would not be watching television that day. Frustrated that a lawyer struck that line from the proposed response, Mr. Kennedy suggested that Joe Lockhart, the White House press secretary, offer an intergalactic response.

“Perhaps Joe, if asked, can say he usually watches ‘Star Trek: Voyager’ at that hour,” Mr. Kennedy wrote. Here’s the interview Mr. Clinton might have missed while he was possibly watching the prequel to the original “Star Trek” series:

Hollywood Strikes Back

Mr. Clinton found some of his strongest financial support among Hollywood moguls who were not too happy when the White House introduced a Summit on Violence in the Media in the wake of the 1999 high school shooting in Columbine, Colo. In one memo, a senior adviser, Minyon Moore, writes that Andy Spahn, an adviser to several megadonors in the entertainment industry, had expressed concern about the summit meeting.

“He indicated that if this was another attempt by the White House and Congress to attack the entertainment industry and not to talk specifically about guns, that this would greatly affect” a fund-raiser scheduled with Mr. Clinton in Los Angeles, Ms. Moore wrote.

In another memo, a White House aide informs Mr. Clinton’s office that David Geffen, the producer and prominent Democratic donor, wanted his foundation mentioned at the summit meeting. “Andy Spahn from his office will try to roll us on this,” the aide wrote. “How do you want me to handle their pressure?”

[Subtitle:] Whitewater, Lewinsky Affair, Vince Foster Suicide Among Scandals Detailed in Newly Released Pages

New records released from former President Bill Clinton’s administration depict a White House scrambling to defuse a series of scandals, with aides preparing detailed strategies to protect Bill and Hillary Clinton in the face of outside investigations that dogged them over two terms.

The nearly 10,000 pages of material made public Friday by the William J. Clinton Presidential Library show White House advisers who were sometimes as suspicious of each other as of the prosecutors examining the first family’s financial dealing and use of power in the 1990s.

Files made public covered some of the lowest points of the Clinton presidency: the Monica Lewinsky sex scandal, the death of former White House Deputy Counsel Vince Foster, and the series of Arkansas and White House dealings known collectively as Whitewater.

In a five-page memo written in 1995, then-White House adviser Ira Magaziner tells Hillary Clinton of how “disloyal” administration officials had “hurt” her and her husband.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“You asked who in the administration was responsible for the harmful accounts" that had appeared in books about the White House, Mr. Magaziner wrote, suggesting who might have might have been behind the leaks.

“I seethe inside when I think of how disloyal some administration officials have been to you and the president,” he added.

The documents are part of a cache of 30,000 pages of material that had been previously withheld under laws exempting certain presidential records from disclosure. Those exemptions have expired and the library has been putting out the material on a rolling basis since February. With the release Friday, the library said it has made public all the material that had been previously held back.

Many of the records lay out intricate plans to guard the Clintons ’ public image as outside investigations ramped up.

In June 1994, White House aide David Dreyer laid out a draft communications plan for responding to Whitewater allegations. Congressional hearings on Whitewater were set to begin, and Mr. Dreyer wrote, “This is going to be a bad story. The hearings are a forum for our opponents.”

In a lengthy memo, he laid out an all-hands-on-deck approach to controlling the story line, suggesting that members of Congress should be recruited to give brief speeches saying nothing happened.

Mr. Dreyer wrote that Republicans “will stop at nothing, including torment the family of Vince Foster to advance their narrow political interests, to stop progress on health care or to hurt the president and Mrs. Clinton.”

The following month, Mr. Dreyer wrote another memo outlining the White House’s strategy for dealing with congressional hearings into Whitewater.

Among the plans: The Democratic National Committee created a video of Republican speeches during the hearings on the Iran-Contra scandal that occurred on GOP President Ronald Reagan ’s watch—to “show members what it means to be on message in support of the administration.”

Also that year, Clinton adviser Paul Begala wrote a memo to Lisa Caputo, the first lady’s press secretary, outlining a strategy for Bill and Hillary Clinton to do a joint television interview.

“In this situation, the Clintons’ attitude is their message,” he wrote in the memo, dated March 1994.

“They must be relaxed, open and forthcoming. Any sense of bitterness, anger, or righteous indignation will not work.”

One word of caution he offered, referencing campaign adviser Mandy Grunwald : “Mandy observes that in many joint interviews, the president defers to the first lady. This may or may not be real, and it might be as simple as Southern manners, but it’s important that the president take the lead on this issue.”

and talking points that show a White House scrambling to protect Bill Clinton.

As details of the president's relationship with Ms. Lewinsky emerge and as the threat of impeachment looms, the White House correspondence often focuses on coordinated talking points emphasizing that "a private mistake does not amount to an impeachable action." Several emails from White House aides discuss whether someone in the West Wing was the source of stories calling Ms. Lewinsky "a stalker."

The documents also include the White House's response to an email from journalist Keith Olbermann, who wrote to apologize for "whatever part I may have played in perpetuating this ceaseless coverage" of the Lewinsky story.

"I'll be heading back to my previous career in sports as quickly as possible," Mr. Olbermann wrote.

MSNBC: "11 things we learned from today's massive Clinton document dump"

By Alex Seitz-Wald and Aliyah Frumin

October 10, 2014, 7:37 p.m. EDT

The Clinton presidential library on Friday released almost 10,000 pages of never-before-seen documents that shed new light on the inner workings of the Clinton White House, from the salacious (Monica Lewinsky) to the political (Mike Huckabee hates Bill Clinton) to the comical (a future Supreme Court justice's profane apology to her boss).

Here are the eleven most interesting revelations from the document dump, in no particular order:

Before she was a Supreme Court justice, Elena Kagan "really f—ked up:" While working as a lawyer in the Clinton White House in 1996, Kagan apologized to him for not keeping him informed about a television segment on the Paula Jones lawsuit. "I realize now that I may·have really f–ked up in not mentioning to you," Kagan wrote to then-White House Counsel Jack Quinn. "God, do I feel like an idiot." Fortunately, her career seems to have survived.

Mike Huckabee "hates" Bill Clinton: After the Columbine school shooting, Bill Clinton's successor as governor of Arkansas, Mike Huckabee, urged the president to issue a national proclamation to promote "positive television programing." Clinton aide appended a handwritten note to the Republican's letter urging a "quick/warm response," because Huckabee "hates BC [Bill Clinton]" and "is planning a Senate race against [Sen. Blanche] Lincoln."

Pressure from Hollywood: As the White House was preparing an event that would highlight the problem with violence in the media for young people, a key Democratic money man warned of a backlash in Hollywood. Andy Spahn, an advisor to some of Hollywood's biggest political donors, warned White House political aide Minyon Moore that the "attack [on] the entertainment industry … would greatly effect the [fundraising] event that this community will be hosting with the POTUS on May 15th in LA," as Moore summarized it to Gore advisor Bruce

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reed. “I would appreciate being kept up to date on these activities to I avoid a backlash.”

Tensions with Jimmy Carter: After Clinton launched missile strikes against a factory in Sudan thought to be used by al-Qaida in retaliation for the U.S. Embassies bombing, his Democratic predecessor called for an investigation into whether the factory actually had been producing chemical weapons. “Oh yeah, Carter’s on the case,” a national security aide commented sarcastically. ”Carter is not persuadable. His comments are over the top, no?”

An apology on Monica Lewinsky: In 1998, then-MSNBC host Keith Olbermann wrote to Clinton apologizing for “whatever part I may have played in perpetuating this ceaseless coverage” of the Lewinsky affair story. In a reply, Clinton thanked Olbermann for his “kind message,” adding “I’m grateful you got in touch with me, and I send you my very best wishes.” Another document shows Lewinsky performing normal White House intern duties, requesting that a portrait of Clinton be hung.

Internal concern over Marc Rich pardon: Clinton’s eleventh hour pardon of billionaire would leave a black mark on his legacy, something longtime Clinton aide Bruce Lindsey foresaw before the pardon, the new documents show. Lindsey was alarmed that Rich and his wife were fugitives, but White House counsel Jack Quinn dismissed the concern. “They (understandably in my mind) chose not to return to the U.S. for a trial in light of all that had happened to them; particularly the enormous and overwhelming adverse and prejudicial publicity generated, I am sure, by the U.S. Attorney [Rudy] Guiliani.” He also criticizes Giuliani for refusing to hear “highly respected independent legal scholars” on the matter.

“A terrific backlash:” A coming back Top Health and Human Services official Peter Edelman, who would later resign in protest from the administration, expressed concern over the confirmation process for Lani Guinier, Clinton’s nominee for assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division. Clinton eventually – and controversially – pulled the nomination following negative press from the right attacking Guinier’s views on voting and democracy. “I am hearing that there will be terrific backlash in the black community if Lani’s nomination is pulled now … She has to have the chance to make her case,” Edelman warned the White House’s top lawyer on June 2, 1993.

“Riding a roller coaster in a hurricane:” As Hillary Clinton’s health care reform task force was getting under way, its leader Ira Magaziner warned the Clintons it would not be easy. “The health care effort is going to be like riding a roller coaster in a hurricane,” he wrote in a memo to the first couple. “If we are well organized, persistent and ‘fight like hell’ every day for the next nine months, we will succeed.”

A health care autopsy: The effort failed and Magaziner conducted an autopsy of sort in 1995, while providing extensive help to journalist David Broder on a book about the process. “I see the inside when I think of how disloyal some administration officials have been to you,” he wrote to Hillary Clinton, “and how hurtful they have been to me in their private discussions with the press.” In addition to disloyal officials and the press, Magaziner also said the delayed process was “fatal.” He added that the delay was not the task force’s fault, but the result of external events.

Keeping the committee secret: The documents show the great lengths the administration went to keep the members of the health care task force and its proceedings secret. Top officials in various parts of the government strategized from the outset how to keep records private, and individual Freedom of Information Act Requests were elevated for discussion about senior White House lawyers. The administration was eventually sued to make the documents public, but a court sided with the White house.

Two president-elects at once? In 2000, weeks after Election Day, with no clear winner, the White House asked the Department of Justice if it could start helping both Al Gore and George W. Bush in their transition efforts. Nope, the department ruled, “since there cannot be more than one ‘President-elect’ and one ‘’Vice-President-elect’ under the Act.”

Washington Post: “Clinton presidential documents show White House amid setbacks, scandals”

By Anne Gearan

October 10, 2014, 11:57 p.m. EDT

White House aides raised questions about how to structure and describe then-first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton’s role in the 1993 attempt to overhaul the health-care system, including whether she would be considered a government employee and whether the group’s work could be kept secret, documents released Friday show.

The lawyerly exchanges among aides in the Clinton White House include suggested talking points to back up the administration’s position that Hillary Clinton could head up a task force on health-care reform without triggering a federal open-meetings requirement.

Scores of documents about the failed health-care effort were among about 10,000 pages of documents released Friday by the Clinton Presidential Library — the last batch in a series released over the past eight months. The trove of unclassified memos, correspondence, phone logs and other papers initially withheld by Clinton charts his administration’s responses to a series of scandals and setbacks.

There is a communications plan for answering questions about the Whitewater affair and the suicide of deputy White House counsel Vince Foster, and discussions about Monica Lewinsky, the Kenneth Starr report on her dalliance with Clinton, the White House travel office debacle and more.

There is also a one-line handwritten note from “BC” to “HRC” asking how one internal strategy discussion turned out.

On health care, which was the new president’s signature first-year effort, the documents show initial qualms within the administration about Hillary Clinton’s role and the plan to do much of the initial work in secret.

A Feb. 3, 1993, legal memo to Hillary Clinton offers several possible ways to structure her participation and notes potential pitfalls. Calling her a consultant, for example, could be seen as a “gimmick.”

On Feb. 17, 1993, a few weeks after Bill Clinton had announced that his wife would lead the work to draft a new federal health-care mandate, a senior lawyer at the agency then known as the General Accounting Office wrote to White House counsel Bernard W. Nussbaum.

Noting that the White House position was that the presence of Hillary Clinton on the panel did not constitute “outside influence” under a 1972 public disclosure law, lawyer Henry R. Wray asked for “further elaboration of your analysis.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If the White House position that the task force would not be covered under the Federal Advisory Committee Act was based on a finding that its membership was made up of federal employees, “on what basis does the first lady qualify under this exemption?” Wray asked. “Are there other reasons why you believe the task force is not subject to FACA? What are the Supreme Court cases on which you are relying, and how do they apply to your analysis of the status of the task force?”

The makeup and operations of the task force quickly became the subject of a federal lawsuit, which the White House ultimately won years later. An initial procedural ruling could have slowed the task force or impeded its work, however, leading to an internal debate about whether to appeal.

Appealing might open the White House to questions about why spokespeople had initially said they were unconcerned or even pleased with the initial decision.

Proposed talking points would have had the press secretary explain it this way:

“As we told you last week, the president was pleased with the district court’s decision because the court held that everything that has happened to date is legal . . . however our lawyers at the Justice Department felt strongly that the court had made substantial errors,” that could negatively affect future cases.

The health-care effort fell apart in 1994. It remains the largest federal policy initiative closely associated with Hillary Clinton, a potential 2016 Democratic candidate for president.

She has since said that the proposed overhaul was too large and too complicated and that the Clinton administration made mistakes.

Bloomberg: “How Bill Clinton’s White House Handled Political Threats”

By Jonathan Allen, Angela Greiling Keane and Toluse Olorunnipa

October 11, 2014

The Clinton White House operated with a siege mentality for eight years, fashioning political strategies designed to preserve the first family and neutralize enemies both real and perceived, according to presidential documents released yesterday for the first time.

Those files shed new light on the approach President Bill Clinton, First lady Hillary Clinton and their aides took to dealing with political threats, including never-give-an-inch aggressiveness, detailed preparation and efforts to get favorable stories in the media.

Clinton White House aides kept track of administration officials who spoke ill of Hillary Clinton’s health-care push. The communications team asked “Sophie’s Choice” author William Styron to write an op-ed noting the 1994 anniversary of deputy White House counsel Vince Foster's suicide to discredit a congressional investigation into an Arkansas land deal known as Whitewater.

"The one-year anniversary of Vince Foster's suicide on July 20th in conjunction with the beginning of congressional Whitewater hearings presents an appropriate opportunity to rebut conspiracy theories over his suicide, and to directly address the political motivations of those who continue to exploit the issue," White House officials David Dreyer and Julia Moffett wrote in a June 1994 memo.

Clinton Culture

It all added up to a fight club culture that permeated the White House and remains a part of the ethos of two-headed Clinton political operation, which would be put to work should Hillary Clinton run for president in 2016.

The documents were published online yesterday by the William J. Clinton Library in Little Rock, Arkansas, as part of a regular release of documents from his presidency.

Two of President Barack Obama's top legal picks -- Supreme Court Justice Elena Kagan and White House Counsel W. Neil Eggleston -- appear throughout the documents due to their work as Clinton associate counsels, and both were involved in seeking to limit congressional access to White House information.

A particular focus of White House aides was protecting Hillary Clinton during the Whitewater investigations.

After Bill Clinton became president in 1993, the couple endured scrutiny over a 1978 Arkansas real-estate deal they had taken part in. While several Clinton associates were convicted of fraud in the failed venture, the Clintons were eventually cleared of wrongdoing.

'Defend HRC'

The investigations included inquiries into Hillary Clinton's legal work for a savings and loan that failed.

For a March 24, 1994, presidential news conference, the second bullet point on a draft of talking points reads: "Defend HRC," using the acronym for Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"Stress her ethics and accomplishments as a lawyer and in doing public-service work," it reads. "No distance between you and HRC regarding Whitewater."

As Bill and Hillary Clinton prepared to do a joint television interview in March of 1994, a memo from Democratic strategist Paul Begala urged the president to "take the lead."

"In many joint interviews, the president defers to the first lady," the memo reads. "This may or may not be real, and it might be as simple as Southern manners, but it's important that the president take the lead on this issue."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Other points in the Begala memo relate to defending the first lady from the public perception that she had become a “political liability” and wielded too much power in the White House.

Op-Ed Response

“Every first lady has had her share of controversy,” the memo reads. It goes on to cite high approval ratings for her in polls.

In January 1996, at least six White House aides -- including Bill Clinton’s campaign strategist Dick Morris -- helped Hillary Clinton craft an op-ed column giving her side of the story, according to the documents.

In the piece, which ran in newspapers including the Spokesman-Review in Spokane, Washington, Clinton defended herself against what she called “outrageous accusations.”

“Close to $30 million in taxpayer money has been spent investigating Whitewater,” she wrote. “But none of these exhaustive inquiries has turned up evidence that we did anything illegal, unethical or wrong.”

The current-day Obama picks -- Kagan and Eggleston -- were among Clinton aides who sought to limit how many documents were released to congressional and Government Accountability Office investigators probing Whitewater and the 1993 firings of seven employees in the White House travel office.

“The committee’s attempt to push its investigation to invade the relationship between the president and his private counsel, however, goes too far,” Kagan wrote Dec. 13, 1995 about the special Senate committee investigating Whitewater. “We cannot responsibly accede to this flagrant abuse of Congress’s investigative powers.”

Lawmaker’s Pursuit

William Clinger, Jr., a Pennsylvania Republican who served two terms in Congress, pursued the Clinton White House as chairman of the House Government Reform and Oversight Committee with his investigation of the travel office firings and subsequent response.

White House staff wrote memos detailing efforts to keep documents relating to the travel office and Whitewater investigations confidential and out of the hands of U.S. lawmakers and the GAO.

Losing Control

“We need to treat all of these investigations with the utmost seriousness,” Eggleston wrote in a June 7, 1994, memo to Lloyd Cutler, working as a special counsel to Clinton. “We will lose all control,” he wrote, if the GAO “is permitted to wander the halls and conduct interviews and review documents at its whim.”

Kagan in May 1996 apologized in a memo to Jack Quinn, then White House counsel, for not informing him of a conversation about an appearance on the “Crossfire” political TV show, using an expletive to express how much she thought she’d erred.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“God, do I feel like an idiot,” Kagan concluded in the explanation to Quinn about an appearance scheduled for “Ab” on the show. Abner Mikva was White House counsel before Quinn. The show was about a lawsuit filed by Paula Jones, a former Arkansas state employee, against Bill Clinton for sexual harassment, alleging it occurred when he was governor of the state.

Kagan spent time defending Clinton in the Jones case, which settled before going to trial. Kagan worked on it with lawyers from Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom. The team was afraid the Supreme Court would agree to hear the case, which it never did.

While most of her work related to Clinton damage control, Kagan in 1996 had to help smooth the fallout when an Olympic kayaker was arrested while paddling on the flooded Potomac River. Kagan refrained from offering a recommendation on that issue, ending her e-mail with, “What next?”

Bloomberg: “Clinton Advisers Urged White House to ‘Defend HRC’”

By Toluse Olorunnipa

October 10, 2014

President Bill Clinton’s White House staff worked for years to keep Hillary Clinton from becoming a “political liability” during investigations into the couple’s Arkansas land deal known as Whitewater.

After Bill Clinton became president in 1993, the couple endured scrutiny over a 1978 Arkansas real estate deal they had taken part in. While several Clinton associates were convicted of fraud in the failed venture, the Clintons were eventually cleared of wrongdoing.

The investigations included inquiries into Hillary Clinton’s legal work for a savings and loan that failed.

“In many joint interviews, the president defers to the First Lady,” the memo reads. “This may or may not be real, and it might be as simple as Southern manners, but it’s important that the President take the lead on this issue.”

Career Controversy

Other points in the Begala memo relate to defending the first lady from the public perception that she had become a “political liability” and wielded too much power in the White House.

“Every First Lady has had her share of controversy,” the memo reads. It goes on to cite poll numbers that showed high approval ratings for the first lady.

“Hillary is the first First Lady to come to the job from a distinguished career of her own, independent of her husband’s,” Begala wrote. “Like many two-career couples, the Clintons have had to find their own way in uncharted waters, juggling career and family.”

In an undated document laying out questions President Clinton might receive about his wife at a news conference, he was told to tell reporters who asked when Hillary learned about a criminal referral on Whitewater to say it was “in the newspapers.” The memo recommends running that answer by lawyers before using it.

Strategic Deflect

Bill Clinton’s prepared answer, if questioned about whether he and Hillary Clinton talked about their work when he was Arkansas governor and she worked at Rose Law Firm, redirected the conversation to the issue of working women.

“Working mothers should be able to have successful careers,” Bill Clinton was told to say. “We should not be making rules that limit the career of one spouse because of the career of the other.”

In January 1996, at least six White House aides -- including Bill Clinton’s campaign strategist Dick Morris -- helped Hillary Clinton craft an op-ed column giving her side of the story, according to the documents.

In the piece, which ran in newspapers such as the Spokesman-Review in Spokane, Washington, Clinton defended herself against from what she called “outrageous accusations.”

“Close to $30 million in taxpayer money has been spent investigating Whitewater,” she wrote. “But none of these exhaustive inquiries has turned up evidence that we did anything illegal, unethical or wrong.”

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: “Clinton Docs: Health-Overhaul Postmortem Identified ‘Disloyal’ Officials”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Peter Nicholas

October 10, 2014, 3:28 p.m. EDT

A White House memo suggests that when Hillary Clinton was first lady in the early 1990s, she was unhappy about leaks that painted her husband's White House in an unflattering light and wanted to know who was behind the disclosures.

Ira Magaziner, then a senior adviser who helped lead Mrs. Clinton's effort to overhaul the health-care system, sent a private memo to her in 1995 that served as a postmortem on the project's collapse.

In the memo, Mr. Magaziner discussed his frustrations with White House colleagues who had been talking to the press and passing information he believed to be damaging.

He told her he wouldn't retaliate in his own discussions with journalists, in part because he worried that could backfire in the 1996 reelection campaign.

He mentioned that he had been meeting with authors of a book chronicling the health-care fight, "The System" by David Broder and Haynes Johnson.

"Although I see the inside when I think of how disloyal some administration officials have been to you and the president and how hurtful they have been to me in their private discussions with the press, I decided to stick to the principle of not being critical of other administration officials and I withheld materials that would cast our colleagues in a bad light," Mr. Magaziner wrote. "Although it is tempting, I just don't feel it's right to do and it could sew discord in 1996 when the book appears, which would not be helpful to the campaign."

The memo was part of a batch of about 10,000 pages of material released Friday by the Clinton Presidential Library. Since February, the library has been releasing archival records that were previously withheld under various exemptions to public records law. Those exemptions have expired, prompting the library to put forward the records on a rolling basis. (See more coverage here.)

Mr. Magaziner's memo goes on to discuss two other books that had come out in 1994: Bob Woodward's "The Agenda" and Elizabeth Drew's "On the Edge."

"You asked who in the administration was responsible for the harmful accounts in their books," Mr. Magaziner wrote. "The Drew book has been especially harmful."

He went on to list various senior Clinton administration officials he said were responsible for unflattering information in the books.

He mentioned Donna Shalala, the former Clinton Health and Human Services secretary and now president of the University of Miami.

Ms. Drew's accounts "are mainly derived from extensive discussions she had with Donna Shalala, which were very damaging to you, me and the president," Mr. Magaziner wrote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He advised there was not much they could do in response.

"Unless we are prepared to show Woodward or Drew documents and respond in kind to other administration officials who trashed us, there is little we can do to make their accounts more accurate," he wrote.

There doesn't seem to be any lingering ill will. In February, Mrs. Clinton, a potential presidential candidate in 2016, gave a paid speech at the University of Miami. Ms. Shalala later said she negotiated a discount in which Mrs. Clinton lowered her standard price.

One who provided information for the Woodward book was Gene Sperling, Mr. Magaziner wrote.

Mr. Sperling served as an economic adviser in both the Clinton and Obama White Houses.

But he, too, appears to be on good terms with the Clintons, taking part in various panel discussions hosted by the family's charitable foundation.

Mr. Magaziner told Mrs. Clinton that he wanted to ensure the Broder-Johnson book – which would be published two years later — wouldn't be overly influenced by the Woodward and Drew books.

"I have shared my responses to Woodward and Drew with Broder and Johnson so they will not accept as uncontested the gossip, false descriptions and false accusations in those books," he wrote.

The Hill opinion: A. B. Stoddard: "Clinton's calculus"

By A. B. Stoddard

October 10, 2014, 5:30 p.m. EDT

It must be hectic at Clinton Inc. these days, what with the excitement of a newborn granddaughter, a busy speaking schedule, that yoga she's doing and now the need to game out multiple scenarios for a coming political storm.

Sure, there is a national election in a few weeks, but commenting on the results will be the easy part for Hillary Clinton. It is what will happen after the election, and all the unknowns, that will confound a candidate so fond of painstaking planning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans, eyeing a Senate majority, are already making plans of their own for the weeks between the election and the new Congress being sworn in on Jan. 3, 2015. During the lame-duck session, some GOP senators are already vowing a showdown over ObamaCare in the vote to pass additional operating funds for the government.

The “risk-corridor” provision in the Affordable Care Act, which would compensate losses by insurance companies from inadequate enrollment, must be added to the new spending bill for 2015. Dubbed the “taxpayer-funded bailout,” critics are vowing to block it, which could lead to another government shutdown. Clinton will find it hard to dodge legislative battles the way she waited nearly three weeks this summer to comment on the chaos in Ferguson, Mo., following the shooting death of unarmed teenager by a policeman.

And should President Obama announce executive action on immigration — which Republicans will characterize as an unconstitutional amnesty — Clinton must prepare to weigh in on what promises to be an explosive political fight.

As it stands, either party could control the upper chamber in the 114th Congress, as there are likely to be runoff elections in both Louisiana and Georgia — and Clinton could be pressed to help save the Democratic Senate majority. The national parties have already reserved resources for what promise to be intense battles should the races continue past election night. Yet it’s not clear that sticking her neck out to save Sen. Mary Landrieu and/or Michelle Nunn will help Clinton much. Should Democrats hold on to a one- or two-seat majority, the former secretary of State would have to spend the next two years defending Obama and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid. It would be far better for her campaign to run against a crazy, obstructionist, overreaching GOP Congress.

And should she win the White House in 2016, she is likely to have a Democratic Senate anyway. Even if the GOP retakes the Senate this year, there’s a great chance it could flip back to Democratic control in two years, when only 10 Democrats are running but 24 Republicans are up for reelection, several in blue states Obama won in 2008 and 2012.

In addition to domestic policy debates, the war against the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS) will continue throughout 2015 and likely Clinton’s entire campaign. Soon Obama is expected to shake up his national security team, according to David Ignatius of The Washington Post. After the makeover, when new personnel are grappling with the ISIS threat and the nuclear ambitions of Iran, how supportive must Hillary Clinton be, particularly if conditions in the Middle East continue to deteriorate? As a presidential candidate she will likely have to contrast what is being done with what must be done better.

Finally, all of these developments will also impact her big debut. Of utmost concern will be the timing of the announcement of her now-old 2016 presidential campaign — just what dramatic lame-duck development could end up stepping on her newsless declaration?

For such a calculating and calculated politician, the volatility of the next three months will challenge Clinton’s best-laid plans. Of course it’s exactly what she will need to expect, should she ever become president. The unexpected gives you the presidency you get, and never the one you want. Just ask Obama.

MAJOR DOMESTIC INITIATIVES

Alliance for a Healthier Generation

[NOTE: This information is embargoed until next Thursday, 2/28] The Alliance will be prominently engaged in a new Let's Move initiative, "Let's Move at Schools," that will be announced by First Lady Michelle Obama on Thursday, February 28th in Chicago. Specifically, the Alliance will serve as one of three managing partners that will oversee the implementation of Let's Move Active Schools. The other managing partners are the President's Council for Fitness, Sport, and Nutrition and the American Association for Health, Physical Education, Recreation, and Dance. As a managing partner of the Let's Move at Schools (LMAS) effort, the Alliance will:

- Leverage the Healthy Schools Program six-step process to help school leaders increase physical activity opportunities. The process includes: building support with students, administrators and staff; completing a self-assessment; creating an action plan; finding resources to support efforts; taking action based on the plan; and celebrating success upon completion of the program.

- Host the LMAS self-assessment tool to determine the school baseline of physical activity within the five Comprehensive School Physical Activity Program, or CSPAP, areas. The self-assessment tool will reside on the Alliance server and website, and the landing page within the Alliance site will indicate its distinct relationship with LMAS. The existing Healthy Schools Program Physical Education and Student Wellness modules will serve as the basis of the LMAS self-assessment (aka the HSP Inventory).

- Provide phone, email and in-person expert technical assistance to school champions and participating schools/ districts to implement system change in Physical Education and Student Wellness. Support will be provided through the following outlets:

  - Provide HSP Ambassadors—physical activity champions—to support the in-person professional development trainings
  - Support Let's Move! Active Schools in the transition to the Healthy Schools Program

These activities will be supported by an initial grant provided by Nike and over time, by other partner corporations. We expect that this effort will accelerate our progress towards meeting our goal of reaching 30,000 schools across the country and helping to deepen our impact on kids' levels of physical activities.

Clinton Health Matters Initiative

CHMI will be featured prominently at the 2013 HIMMS Conference, at which YOU will be making remarks. Verizon has invited CHMI to serve as a panelist during a session on secure exchange of medical information and to have a presence at its exhibit.

CHMI released the Coachella Valley Blueprint for Action this week, which outlines the steps the community will take over the next five years to improve overall health and to close health disparity gaps.

CHMI had a successful meeting with Jacksonville Mayor Alvin Brown about the launch of its community initiative in the Greater Jacksonville region.

Clinton Economic Opportunity Initiative

- Inc. magazine is meeting with Bank of America this week to discuss the possibility of securing its sponsorship for a Women's Summit. Depending on the outcome of these discussions, Inc. may be ready to move forward with discussions around the Clinton Foundation's possible involvement in specific aspects of the Summit (e.g., keynote/ panel speaker, mentoring-related tie-ins, panel topics) as part of a new partnership.

- A six-month post-mentoring program check-in was performed on key pairings from the Philadelphia EMP program. A small handful of these mentee-mentor pairs were only beginning to see the impact of their work together at the conclusion of the program last August, and had noted they believed they would see the greater part of the program's impact in future months.

- For one mentee-mentor pairing, what had already proven to be an impactful mentoring relationship has gone on to become an even larger success:

  Angelo Salandra is the President and CEO of Quality Management Services, a records management, administrative support and onsite management services company. Angelo recognized the need to diversify his customer base and sought out a mentor to help him expand his business into the government sector. Working closely with Hubin Jiang, President & CEO of ECOMPEX, Inc., a significant provider of similar services to the government, Angelo was able to quickly learn the ropes to government procurement resulting in a new government contract. By the program's completion in August 2012, the new government work Angelo was able to garner as a result of his collaboration with Hubin through the Entrepreneur Mentoring Program had helped him to hire an additional five full time employees to his firm (18% increase in workforce) and had driven a 9% increase in the company's annual revenue. Six months later, with Hubin's continued support, Angelo has been able to secure four additional contracts, resulting in an overall increase in annual revenue of over 30%.

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative

Malawi

CDI is moving forward quickly to develop its plan for building the new Anchor Farm in Tanzania. Walker Morris is working to schedule a meeting with the Minister of Agriculture on his trip to Tanzania in March to discuss an MOU and to look at options for the location of the first commercial farm.

AGRA has asked CDI to host a field day at Mpherero Farm in Malawi to show representatives from a number of organizations working in agriculture, including USAID and IITA, the work of the Anchor Farm Project.

Rwanda (CHDI)

Construction on the Mt. Meru Soyco site is 75% complete, and the production of edible oil is expected to begin in July 2013. The government has promised CHDI full support, particularly in terms of production of raw materials. This week, the Prime Minister visited the factory and was very pleased with its progress.

CHDI has been participating in various exhibitions organized at the District level to demonstrate our work and help farmers understand the difference between varieties of maize and soybean.

Construction of the coffee roasting factory has been on hold for the last three weeks due to a construction permit issue. However, approval has been obtained by the city council and the official construction permit will be signed by the city's mayor next week.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

Peru

On February 15th, the Peru Cataracts project achieved its 50,000 surgery commitment. The goal was reached within 80% of the original budget and ahead of the four year schedule.

and sell hard to access products to their remote communities. The product offering is being designed to include fast moving consumer goods such as soaps, cooking oil, yarn and clothing, and extends to over-the-counter pharmaceuticals and multivitamins as well as pro-poor products such as solar lamps and clean cook stoves. The first twelve entrepreneurs have completed their training and have sold approximately 2,000 products under consignment over the last five weeks. The venture provides life-changing income opportunities for these women and has the dual benefit of providing last mile distribution to the poor communities where they reside. Another six women have recently been recruited and are undergoing product sales training including the selling of low-cost VisionSpring reading glasses. If successful in Apurimac, CGSGI intends to scale this venture throughout Peru and possibly to other developing nations.

Clinton Global Initiative

Annual Meeting

CGI currently has 160 paying members registered for the 2013 Annual Meeting, which represents an increase of 33 members since the last bi-weekly report and a reduction of the year-over-year variance from -52 to -22. Of the total number of registrants, 133 are renewals, 35 fewer than last year at this time, and 27 are new, 13 more than last year at this time.

Winter Meeting

370 individuals attended the Winter Meeting. Of that total, 40% had not previously attended a CGI event. This includes representatives from organizations that have never been CGI members as well as representatives from current members who have never attended a prior CGI event. Outreach to recruit potential paying members from this pool is underway.

The plenary session, four of five breakout sessions, the CGI Orientation and the Girls and Women special session were standing room only.

CGI is still tabulating the results of a survey distributed to participants and will report back any notable findings in the next bi-weekly report.

CGI University

Confirmed program participants for CGI U 2013 include: Sal Khan, Jack Dorsey, Stephen Colbert, and Muhammad Yunus.

The acceptance rate for applicants is 35% this year. Applicants will be notified of their status by the end of the day today.

CGI America

CGI America has 95 paying participants, including 8 Annual Meeting members and 87 non-Annual Meeting members. There were two paying participants at this time last year.

COLD TURKEY

THE STORY

Yesterday, things got a lot more complicated in Syria.

GIMME SOME BACKGROUND.

The Syrian civil war has been going on for over four years. Russia has been trying to help Syrian President Assad stay in power; the US and friends (like Turkey) have been trying to get Assad out of power and help the rebels trying to oust him. Meanwhile, ISIS has had a great time flourishing in the war torn country. No one likes ISIS, which is why Russia has recently joined the fight to try and get rid of the group. Which it does some of the time; other times, it's also targeting the plain ol' rebels going after Assad. After this month's Paris attacks, the world was hoping everyone would put their differences aside and work together to defeat ISIS in the region once and for all.

WHAT HAPPENED YESTERDAY?

Turkey shot down a Russian warplane near the Turkish-Syrian border. One of the pilots is dead, and Russia says the other was rescued. And according to Russia, a marine was also shot and killed by rebel groups as he tried to rescue the pilots. Officially, Turkey says this was about Russia violating its airspace. But Russia says its plane never crossed into Turkey's airspace. Unofficially, it's much more complicated.

WHAT HAPPENED TO MY TURKEY?

You'll eat it tomorrow. Things between Russia and Turkey have been pretty strained. In their spare time, Assad's forces — supported by Russia — have also been fighting a rebel group that's good friends with Turkey. According to Turkey, ISIS doesn't even operate in the region where the plane was downed yesterday, and they think this rebel group was Russia's real target and it was just hiding behind the ISIS excuse.

NOW WHAT?

Well, Putin called the incident a "stab in the back," and said Turkey's actions will have "serious consequences."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But President Obama said Turkey's allowed to defend its territory. Turkey called for an emergency NATO meeting.

heSKIMM

Right now there are a lot of cooks in the Syrian kitchen bumping into each other on the ground and in the air. Making an already complicated global crisis that much more difficult. Meanwhile, yesterday was believed to be the first time a NATO country took down a Russian plane in 50 years. Happy holidays.

REPEAT AFTER ME...

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR DAD SAYS HE DROPPED ONE OF THE PIES...

Well, sh*t. Chicago hears you. The city is on edge after yesterday, a white police officer there was charged with first-degree murder in the death of a black teen last year. The charges came just hours before a graphic police video of the incident was released. It shows 17-year-old Laquan McDonald , who officials say was on a hallucinogenic drug, ignoring officers pursuing him and jogging in the street while carrying a small knife. Then, an officer shoots him...16 times. According to the state attorney, many of those shots happened after McDonald was already on the ground. Officials announced the charges and released the video at the same time, to try to avoid the kind of unrest that hit Ferguson, MO last year. Last night, hundreds of peaceful protesters were out in the streets of Chicago – saying the investigation shouldn't have taken over a year to complete.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR MOM SAYS THE TURKEY'S ALMOST READY...

'll take mine well done. Yesterday, the CDC announced that at least 19 people in seven states are sick with E. coli. The culprit? Costco chicken salad. The CDC says that so far, at least five people have been hospitalized and two have kidney failure. E. coli: a bacteria that can cause food poisoning and sometimes lead to a serious infection. For most people, that means some QT in the bathroom – but it can get particularly bad for little kids and grandparents. This comes after everyone's favorite food sample destination was linked to a recent salmonella outbreak - again having to do with its chicken. Costco says it's stopped selling the chicken salad while the feds investigate. Good idea.

Who are you, Elon Musk? Yesterday, the Space X founder and CEO got a liiiiittle competitive with fellow billionaire, Amazon founder and CEO Jeff Bezos. Bezos also has his own space company, Blue Origin. And yesterday, Blue Origin sent a rocket to the edge of space and back with a controlled landing. BFD, since Blue Origin is hoping to eventually use he tech to send people to space and back. Yesterday, Bezos celebrated, calling the rocket landing the "rarest of beasts." Which Musk said, 'hi, remember me?' He responded by pointing out that the landing wasn't so rare – his company did the same thing three years ago. So no, it seems not all is gravy.

Subject: Clean Water Progress for the Chesapeake

Clean Water Action logo with wave background

Dear Mary,

The assault on our water being cranked up by polluters and their allies across our Chesapeake Bay Region and in Washington, DC is unprecedented – and alarming. With your help, Clean Water Action has been able to hold the line against the polluters, stopping the worst of the rollbacks, so far. But the attacks aren't over yet.

Winter Creek

Will you keep standing with us now? Your gift today will help Clean Water Action stop these Dirty Water attacks. Together, we can protect our water and health.

Stand with us to continue our clean water progress!

The nation's worst polluters, including Big Coal, want to weaken fundamental clean water protections. And so far this year, the U.S. House has voted 170 times to weaken clean air and clean water laws or to block the U.S. EPA from doing its job protecting people's health. Now, the U.S. Senate is poised to vote on the polluters' Dirty Water agenda.

Action by Clean Water Action members over the past several days has strengthened our chances for success in the Senate. But this will still be very close, and the attacks on our water aren't over yet.

Now is also the time to go on the offensive. Those elected officials with records stained by their Dirty Water votes must be held accountable when they seek reelection in 2012, if not sooner. With your continued support , we can make that happen.

What's happening in Washington is not separate from what's happening locally across our region. At stake is the future of the Chesapeake Bay, and all the rivers and streams that feed it. Our continued progress on tackling impacts on our water from fracking for natural gas, mining for uranium or reckless, poorly planned development will also help shift the momentum back in favor of Clean Water in Congress.

With your help , we've made significant clean water progress over the past 40 years. With your help, we'll continue that progress toward a future with fishable, swimmable, drinkable water for ALL Americans. Now is the time when your financial support and active involvement will make all the difference. Please give generously today to help Clean Water Action continue fighting in Congress and all across the U.S. to protect our clean water future.

Yours for Clean Water,

Robert Wendelgass, President & CEO

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS, HOST: And the author of "Clinton Clash," Peter Schweizer, joins us now.

Thank you for joining us this morning, Peter.

You know, I was looking at the book jacket right here and you say that, here in the book jacket that your reporting raises serious and alarming questions about judgment of possible indebtedness to an array of foreign interests and ultimately, a fitness for high public office.

So how does your reporting show that Hillary Clinton may be unfit for the presidency?

PETER SCHWEIZER, AUTHOR, "CLINTON CLASH": Well, I think the real question here, George, is when you ever have an issue of the flow of funds to political candidates, whether that's to their campaigns, whether that's to private foundations, whether that's to their spouse, is there evidence of a pattern of -- of favorable decisions being made for those individuals?

And I think the -- the point that we make in the book is that there is a troubling pattern.

There are dozens of examples of that occurring.

Some people, I think particularly the Clinton camp, would say that these are all coincidence. I don't think, when you're talking about 12 instances, you're talking coincidence. I think you're talking trend.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But you take it pretty far. You write that, "The pattern of behavior is troubling enough to warrant further investigation by law enforcement (INAUDIBLE)."..

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Do you have any evidence that a crime may have been committed?

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think it's -- if you look at a couple of recent examples. For example, Governor McConnell down in Virginia, or you look at Senator Menendez , in these cases, you didn't have evidence of a quid pro quo. What you had was funds flowing to elected officials, some of them gifts, some of them campaign contributions and actions that were being taken by those public officials that seemed to benefit the contributors.

Certainly, I think it warrants investigation. What that investigation will reveal, we'll see.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But a criminal investigation?

SCHWEIZER: Well, we'll see. I mean that's what the Governor McConnell has faced and that's what Menendez has faced.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SCHWEIZER: And I think the evidence here is far more widespread in terms of repeated action than there were in those two instances.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the Clinton campaign says you haven't produced a shred of evidence that there was any official action as secretary that -- that supported the interests of donors.

SCHWEIZER: Well...

STEPHANOPOULOS: We've done investigative work here at ABC News, found no proof of any kind of direct action. And an independent government ethics expert, Bill Allison, of the Sunline Foundation (ph), wrote this. He said, "There's no smoking gun, no evidence that she changed the policy based on donations to the foundation."

No smoking gun.

Is there a smoking gun?

SCHWEIZER: Yes. The smoking gun is in the pattern of behavior. And here's the analogy I would give you. It's a little bit like insider trading . I wrote a book on Congressional insider trading a couple of years ago and talked with prosecutors.

Most people that engage in criminal insider trading don't send an e-mail that says I've got inside information, buy this stock.

The way they look at it, they look at a pattern of stock trades. If the person has access to that information and then they do a series of well-timed trades. That warrants investigation.

I think the same thing applies here.

By the way, what's important to note is it was confirmed on Thursday, both by "The New York Times" and "The Wall Street Journal," that there are multi-million dollar, non-disclosed donations that were made to the Clinton Foundation that were never disclosed by the Clintons.

This is a direct breach of an agreement they suggested with the White House.

STEPHANOPOULOS: That -- that is an issue for them, but it's not a criminal -- it's nothing that would warrant a cmii.

So let's look at some of the specifics behind your pattern.

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: A lot of focus on the sale of a company, Uranium One, to a -- to a Russian company. Of course, Frank Drisdra (ph), who had committed, what, a $130 million, a pledge to the Clinton Foundation back in 2006, had had an interest in this company.

But he actually sold it.

SCHWEIZER: Well, he sold his stock, but his firm, Endeavor Financial, continued to do finance deals well after that. And the individuals involved in the book, as you probably read, there are nine -- count them, nine major contributors to the Clinton Foundation who were involved in that nuclear deal.

The two individuals who were the financial advisers on the deal of the sale to the Russians, they're both major Clinton Foundation supporters. The chairman of that Foundation, Ian Telfer, whose donations were not disclosed, campaign -- and sorry, Clinton Foundation contributor. And there are others.

So this is not just about Frank Giustra. This is multiple layers (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: OK, but you didn't disclose in your book that he had sold the interest.

SCHWEIZER: Yes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Beyond that, this deal was approved by a -- a board of the government called the CFIUS Board.

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

STEPHANOPOULOS: This actually chaired by the secretary of the Treasury...

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- not the secretary of State.

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Eight other agencies on board, the secretary of State, Homeland Security, Defense, Commerce...

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- Energy, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission...

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- signed off on it. And even though the State Department was one of nine agencies to sign off on it, there's no evidence at all that Hillary Clinton got directly involved in this decision.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think it warrants further investigation. And there's a couple of things that need to be clarified.

Number one, she was one vote -- or the State Department was one vote on CFIUS. But any agency has veto power. So it needs to be unanimous. So they had to support this agreement.

The second thing that I would say is that in the midst of all of this, Hillary Clinton was in charge of the Russian reset. She was in charge of -- in -- of the A123 nuclear agreements with the Russians. She was the one that was meeting with Lavrov. There were four senior congressmen on national security issues that raised concerns about this issue...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But wait a second. There were nine different agencies...

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- who approved it.

Doesn't that suggest that that was because there was no national security concern, not because of some nefarious influence by Hillary Clinton?

SCHWEIZER: But -- but look at the nine individuals that were on the CFIUS committee, the nine agencies represented.

Who was, by far, the most hawkish on CFIUS issues in the past?

Hillary Clinton. She was big on rejecting the Dubai ports deal. She was big on other issues. She sponsored legislation when she was in the Senate to straighten CFIUS.

This was a signature issue for her and this is totally out of character...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the assistant secretary who sat -- the assistant secretary of State who sat on the committee said she never intervened on any CFIUS issue at all.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think that deserves further scrutiny. I would question that.

To argue that (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But based on what?

Based on what?

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think based on her (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Do you have any evidence that she actually intervened in this issue?

SCHWEIZER: No, we don't have direct evidence. But it warrants further investigation because, again, George, this is part of the broader pattern. You either have to come to the conclusion that these are all coincidences or something else is afoot.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And that -- that is that -- the Clintons do say it's a coincidence. As they say, you have produced no evidence. And I still haven't heard any direct evidence and you just said you had no evidence that she intervened here.

But I do want to ask a broader question.

It's been reported that you -- you briefed several Republicans on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, including the chairman, Bob Corker.

Did you offer any briefings for Democrats?

SCHWEIZER: No, but I'd be glad to give them before the book is released. This was a -- a friend that asked me. He thought it would be a good idea to talk to these individuals. This was the committee that confirmed her.

And I was glad to meet with them. They did not get copies of the book. They did not get any material. It was simply a verbal briefing.

And I'd be glad to brief any Democrats before May 5th, when the book comes out.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the Democrats have said this is -- this is an indication of your partisan interest. They say...

SCHWEIZER: Well...

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- you used to work for President -- President Bush as a speechwriter. You're funded by the Koch brothers.

How do you respond to that?

SCHWEIZER: Well, George, what did I do when this book was completed?

I went to the investigative unit at "The New York Times," the investigative unit here at ABC. I went to the investigative unit at "The Washington Post." And I shared with them my findings, OK. These are not cupcakes. These are serious researchers and investigators.

And they are confirming what I've reported. So people can look at the facts and...

STEPHANOPOULOS: They haven't come -- they haven't confirmed any evidence of any crime.

SCHWEIZER: Well, but -- but it's not up to an author to prove crime. I mean do you think that when people first started looking at Governor McConnell or they started looking at Menendez, that they immediately had evidence?

You need subpoena power. You need access to records and information. You need access to e-mails.

There's all sorts of things that you can do. You can't leave it up to an author to say that an author has to prove a criminal case.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Finally, Bloomberg News is reporting that you're going to be looking into Jeb Bush's business dealings, as well.

Is that true?

What have you found?

Where and when will you publish?

SCHWEIZER: We've been working on it for about four months. We've been looking at land deals. We've been looking at an airport deal. We've been looking at some financial transactions involving hedge funds based out of the UK.

We have already reached out to several media outlets and we're going to adopt a similar model that we have here, which is to share that information with investigative journalists at established news outlets, share with them that information.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And I think that people will find it very, very interesting and compelling.

Peter Schweizer, thanks very much.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Thanks for having me, George.

Up next, the roundtable on this Hillary book and augways (ph) from the campaign trail.

Plus, same-sex marriage coming to the Supreme Court this week.

Bruce Jenner's big announcement puts transgender issues in the spotlight. We debate the next frontier in civil rights.

7th Annual Halifax International Security Forum Gathers in Wake of Terrorist Attacks on Paris

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
16 November 2014

WASHINGTON, DC – Friday's terrorist attacks in Paris will be front-and-center as international defense and security leaders from around the world meet this weekend for the Halifax International Security Forum.

Canada's new Minister of National Defence, The Honourable Harjit Singh Sajjan, will be hosting high-ranking delegates from 60 countries to this year's Forum. Participants include The Honourable Kent Hehr, Canada's Minister of Veterans Affairs and Associate Minister of National Defence; Robert Work, U.S. Deputy Secretary of Defense; General John Vance, Canadian Chief of Defence Staff; and, Admiral Michael Rogers, Director of the U.S. National Security Agency.

"Canada's new Defence Minister will play an active and important role at this year's Forum," said Peter Van Praagh, President of the Halifax International Security Forum. "Minister Sajjan's tours of duty in Bosnia and Afghanistan give him an important perspective of the issues we will be discussing in Halifax, and participants from around the world are anxious to hear from him."

"As the world reels from last week's attacks in Paris, those events, as well as the downed Russian Metrojet over Sinai and recent bombings in Beirut, underline the importance of meeting annually to learn from each other," added Van Praagh. "Halifax is where defense and security experts, together with democratic leaders meet to assess the challenges of the past year and set the agenda for dealing with the challenges for the year ahead."

U.S. Senators Tim Kaine (D-VA) and John Barrasso (R-WY) will lead a bipartisan congressional delegation at the Forum.

Now in its seventh year, the Halifax International Security Forum is recognized as the world's most

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 07/29/08

Main Topics: McCain's Larry King Interview, "Troops" Ad

Summary: In light of Obama's reduced lead in today's poll, pundits on all channels discussed the efficacy of polling this early. Other foci were the influence of big money, McCain's position on affirmative action and McCain's anti-Obama ad; the last being generally regarded as a bad move. Spreading wildfires in Yosemite threaten thousands. US-Iraqi forces begin a new offensive targeting al-Qaeda strongholds.

McCain Reflects On Skin Problems, Again Attacks Obama For Not Visiting Troops Stationed In Germany (CNN 07/28/08 11:05pm)
KING: We begin tonight with Senator John McCain, the presumptive Republican presidential nominee. He is in Bakersfield, California.

Good to have you with us, Senator.

You had a mole-like growth removed earlier today. What's the story?

MCCAIN: Actually, it was just a little spot on my face. I go to a routine check-up every three months, Larry. And as you can see, it is just a routine thing we do quite frequently for those of us that, when we were young, we had great exposure to the sun. As you know, my dad was in the Navy and we lived in places where I was at the beach a lot and that's -- I'm paying a price for that. But it's fine. It's a routine thing and I get it done every three months or so.

But I want to, again, urge our viewers -- if you remember anything I say, then I'd careful of the sun, especially with children because this melanoma is an increasing threat to the lives of Americans and people all over the world.

KING: Senator, do they biopsy something like that?

MCCAIN: Oh, yes. Every once in a while, yes they do. They take a little, tiny piece and biopsy it, just to be on the safe side. And that's the thing about melanoma, as opposed to sometimes other forms of cancer, as you know, Larry. If you just have a discoloration, if you have anything, go ahead and see your dermatologist and let the dermatologist check it out.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

KING: When do you get the results of this biopsy?

MCCAIN: I think tomorrow. I've had -- I've had many in the intervening years. And by the way, also, that's -- those of us who have very fair skin it's, doctors will tell you, even a greater risk. But it's a risk to everyone. It's a risk to everyone. And don't think that it isn't, no matter what your background is or your ancestry. Be very careful.

KING: Is it fair that voters should be concerned about your health though? You've had four melanomas surgically removed. It's, if not an issue, it's certainly a concern isn't it?

MCCAIN: I don't think so, Larry. As I say, melanoma is something if you look at it, and you be careful, it's fine. I had one serious bout with it and that was, frankly, due to my own neglect because I let it go and go and go. In fact, I was running for president at the time. I'm not making that mistake again.

Look, there's a lot of things going on but that certainly isn't one of them.

KING: And the rest of your health is OK?

MCCAIN: It's great. It's -- very invigorated, feeling great, having a lot of fun. And, as I have told you before on this show, a guy that stood fifth from the bottom of his class at the Naval Academy in America -- anything is possible.

KING: Senator Obama has taken flack for a recent overseas trip. Your campaign called it a premature victory lap. He was asked about such criticisms yesterday at a Unity of Journalists of Color Conference in Chicago. Here's what he said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. BARACK OBAMA (D-IL), PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE: I was puzzled by this notion that somehow what we were doing was in any way different from what Senator McCain or a lot of presidential candidates have done in the past. Now, I admit, we did it really well --

(APPLAUSE)

OBAMA: -- and that -- but that shouldn't be a strike against me.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: Senator, you criticized him for the trip, a trip that you told him to make. MCCAIN: Actually, I was glad that he went to Iraq. I was puzzled and befuddled by the fact that he announced his policy towards Iraq and Afghanistan before he went. I had hoped that he would go, and for the first time, sit down and get a briefing from General Petraeus. You know he never had before?

I had wished, in a way, that he had a hearing in the subcommittee that he chairs on Afghanistan since he has the responsibility oversight of NATO. But incredibly to me, still, is that he does not acknowledge that the surge succeeded. No rational person could go to Iraq in the last few days and compare it to two years ago and not acknowledge that the surge has succeeded. And that's why I question very much why he would continue to fail to acknowledge that a strategy -- admittedly -- he condemned it, he said it wouldn't work, he said that it would make things worse, et cetera.

But at least he ought to acknowledge -- after getting briefed by General Petraeus and meeting these brave young Americans who have sacrificed so much in making sure that this strategy succeeded -- that he should acknowledge their success. How do you welcome this last brigade home that's coming home and say, hey, great job, but by the way, you didn't succeed? I don't know how you do that.

KING: But was he right in saying that a lot more emphasis should have been put on Afghanistan?

MCCAIN: Well, listen, this is -- if we had failed in Iraq, our complications in Afghanistan would have been far, far more complicated.

What Senator Obama doesn't understand is that they are all connected. If we had lost the war in Iraq, we would have had much greater problems in Afghanistan. And also, the strategy that he said wouldn't work in Iraq is the same strategy we have to employ in Afghanistan. It's not just to increase the number of troops; it's secure and hold, it's a government that functions more effectively, it's taking on the narco-traffickers, it's the issue of Pakistan, which is of course the border area -- it's uncontrolled. So it's got to be an overall strategy. And Senator Obama does not understand that, just like he didn't understand the situation in Iraq.

KING: So you're not criticizing him for the trip, which you told him to make, you're criticizing him for what you say is a lack of awareness?

MCCAIN: Lack of understanding -- complete lack of understanding of what America's national security threats are.

But the other thing is that, of course -- the fact that in Germany he did not go to Landstuhl. And I can assure you that the troops welcome, especially those who are the gravely wounded ones, welcome American senators. And if he had wanted to go with just a staffer, I am confident that he could have gone, rather than cancel his trip to see those brave young Americans.

But it's also about bringing back prosperity. KING: He must have understood that. Why do you think he didn't go?

MCCAIN: I have no idea except that I know that according to reports that he wanted to bring media people and cameras and his campaign staffers and I want to guarantee you, if I had gone to Landstuhl, which I have and met with the troops there and met with the wounded but if I had gone there and the military had said, you can't see these wounded people. I guarantee I'd have been on the phone with the secretary of defense immediately. I'd have seen them.

KING: We'll be right back with Senator McCain with what everyone wants to know. Who might his running mate going to be? That's ahead.

McCain Reiterates Support For Drilling, Says He Would Support Maliki Call For Withdrawal (CNN 07/28/08 11:15pm)
MCCAIN: I said I would rather lose a campaign than see America lose a war.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: We're back with Senator John McCain. We have an e-mail question from Scott in Chappaqua, New York. We haven't heard that city mentioned in a while: "I have noticed particularly in the past few days that you've increased your use of negative ads and personal statements about Senator Obama. Whatever happened to your assurances you would not engage in such negativity? What about your calls for a civil and respectful campaign?"

MCCAIN: Well, first of all, I admire and respect Senator Obama. He has done a great job securing the nomination to his party. He also used his opposition to the war in Iraq as a way to secure that. Look, there are just start differences between us and those differences need to be drawn, whether it be health care or he wants basically government to run the health care program. Whether it wants taxes where he wants to raise taxes whereas I want to keep them low.

To our national security requirements and including offshore drilling. He's opposed to offshore drilling. He is opposed to nuclear power. Right now the American people are hurting very badly as you know, Larry. They are sitting around the kitchen table trying to figure out how they can do all these things and these are stark differences and the American people in my view need to hear about them.

KING: So you're saying it's not negative, it's differences of opinion?

MCCAIN: Oh yes. I mean, they are clearly differences. Senator Obama is against storing spent nuclear fuel or reprocessing it. I favor it. He is against offshore drilling. I favor it. Those are strong differences.

KING: You opposed offshore ... MCCAIN: And Americans care a great deal.

KING: You opposed offshore drilling ...

MCCAIN: Yes, when oil was a buck. When oil was $1.80 a gallon or $1.20 or whatever it is. Now it is right around $4.00 and so of course. But I also believe states should be making those decisions as well but I'd love to give them some more incentives to do so.

KING: In 2004, you were asked what the United States would do if the sovereign government of Iraq - of Iraq asked you to pull out, even if the United States wasn't happy about the security situation. Do you stand by that? If Iraq said "pull out," would you say OK?

MCCAIN: Sure, but the fact is that even Prime Minister Maliki has stated that it was condition-based and more importantly, or as importantly, Senator Obama's dates for withdrawal proposal, which, by the way, his original proposal they would have been out of there last March but the present proposal, our highest ranking military officer, Admiral Mullen, said would be very dangerous.

General Petraeus said that it would be very dangerous for us to pursue that strategy. I also would listen very carefully, particularly to General Petraeus, who has carried this incredible surge which many political pundits on your show said that had no chance and that the war was lost.

Harry Reid announced the war was lost. General Petraeus should be listened to. And he shouldn't drive all decisions. But at the same time, the fact is that the Iraqis are interested in their security as well and we will negotiate with them on a conditions-based basis and we'll withdraw because we've succeeded and we're coming home in victory.

Senator Obama said he might have to go back. I guarantee you, when they come home under my plan, they won't have to go back.

KING: In that regard, you said Friday on CNN that you thought 16 months might be a pretty good timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. And that sounds a lot like what Senator Obama has been saying. So what's the difference there?

MCCAIN: I love these days of the sound bite. I said it has to be based on conditions on the ground. Senator Obama said it's a hard and firm date. That's why the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff said it had to be conditions based and said that his approach would be very, very dangerous. The way the question was asked, why not 16 months? The fact is we have to be conditioned based and we are withdrawing. The last brigade from the surge is coming home at the end of this month or early next month and we will be having further withdrawals based on conditions.

Now whether that fits into 16 months or not, or one month, or whatever, the point is it's got to be conditions-based and that's the point General Petraeus is trying to get over as we go into this political season.

KING: If you were president and knew that bin Laden was in Pakistan, you know where, would you have U.S. forces go in after him?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: Larry, I'm not going to go there and here's why, because Pakistan is a sovereign nation. I think the Pakistanis would want bin Laden out of their hair and out of their country and it's causing great difficulties in Pakistan itself.

But I want to assure you I will get Osama bin Laden as president of the United States and I will bring him to justice no matter what it takes.

KING: You have said quite a bit lately in all of your speeches practically that you will never do anything just for politics. You will stand on your own philosophy and not go the political route. Can't we say that Senator Obama did that when he opposed the war in Iraq and 80 percent of America favored it? Wasn't he standing on a principle?

MCCAIN: Well, first of all, he was in the Illinois State Senate.

KING: Right. But he still vocally expressed it.

MCCAIN: Well, the fact is we achieved significant victory initially and it was the failed strategy afterwards by Rumsfeld that I stood up against and was called disloyal by Republicans for saying we had to have this new strategy and we had to win. I am glad Saddam Hussein is not in power anymore. He used weapons of mass destruction twice, once on his own people and there's no doubt he would be trying to acquire and use weapons of mass destruction again.

I think the world is better off with a stable ally in the Middle East in the form of an Iraqi government that is an ally and friend.

KING: If this would go back, start all over again, would you go into Iraq if you could go back?

MCCAIN: I think the world is better off knowing what I know at the time and the fact that Saddam Hussein was bent on acquiring weapons of mass destruction, $12 billion Oil for Food scandal. American airplanes were being shot at. Sanctions were breaking down. It's clear that he wanted to go back and acquire weapons of mass destruction and use them. I don't think there is any doubt. I think we did the right thing. I think that it was a colossal intelligence failure on the part of the United States and every other county as to whether he had them or not. But again, I would remind you, I said we would have an easy victory. We did.

And then we employed the wrong strategy which doomed us to failure and we were losing this war when I said we had to have this new strategy all along and stoop up for it when most political pundits said that my career was finished.

KING: Some more moments with the Senator, the vice presidential question and answer, maybe, next.

You're watching LARRY KING LIVE.

McCain Says he Supports AZ Affirmative Action Ban, School Vouchers (CNN 07/28/08 11:25pm)
MCCAIN: I will always, always put my country first and I look you in the eye and tell you I will never let you down.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: We have a history on this program that whenever the vice presidential nominee is announced, he or she appears on this show the next night. It's been going on for quite a while. We hope that Senator McCain follows that tradition since I have a hunch he will not announce tonight who that candidate is.

But how close are we?

MCCAIN: I want to say that that vice presidential candidate will be on your show. I will not risk the wrath of Larry King. I want to assure you.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

KING: How close are we?

MCCAIN: We're in the process. As you know, if I comment on it in any more detail then it causes a flurry of speculation. We are blessed with a large number of people who I think would serve not only as vice president but as president and so I really can't comment much more.

KING: OK.

MCCAIN: On the process, Larry.

KING: A recent poll ...

MCCAIN: I know you understand that.

KING: I understand. But a recent poll says 60 percent of registered voters think you should definitely pick a running mate with strong economic credentials. Is that fair?

MCCAIN: I think whatever the American people think is fine. I do want to emphasize again my economic credentials including being chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, Science and Transportation, every part of our nation's economy, which I have extensive experience in and I have five Nobel Prize winners and over 300 economists who think my economic plan is a good one.

So we'll be talking a lot about the economy, about keeping people in their jobs, about energy independence. Right now as you know, Americans are hurting very badly and I've got to show them and am showing them a positive plan for a strong economic recovery and I want to emphasize to you again. I believe America's best days are ahead of us but we've got to make tough decisions like nuclear power. We've got to drill offshore. We've got to do a lot of things that will maximize the ingenuity and entrepreneurship of America, including keeping people in their homes.

KING: Senator, this is a fair question, I think. You don't have to tell us.

MCCAIN: Any question you give - any question you ask is fair, Larry.

KING: We go back a long way. I rode the bus with you.

Do you know who it is?

MCCAIN: Oh, no, no, of course not, really.

KING: OK. Will you announce it before the Olympics? Isn't this a timing, strategic question?

MCCAIN: I don't know because again if I assume that, then where we are in the process, I can tell you that I will announce it just as soon as the process is completed but it won't be driven by any other factors, the Olympics, or any other. It will be strictly on when we can arrive at a conclusion and obviously it's tough because we have so many highly qualified individuals.

KING: Men and women?

MCCAIN: Yes, sir, men and women. And if I start running down the list, I'll get in real serious trouble.

KING: Concerning the Olympics, if you were president, would you attend the Opening Ceremonies?

MCCAIN: You know, I don't think I would particularly in light of the Tibetan situation. I want good relations with China. I recognize China is an emerging superpower but frankly I don't question the president's decision and it's a decision only a president can take. As a private citizen I think that the television coverage of it is going to be very excellent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

KING: Well said.

All right. The next president will apparently, according to all announcements, will inherit a budget deficit of more than $480 billion. And I know we can't answer that in a short time. How are you going to deal with that?

MCCAIN: First cut spending. We let spending get completely out of control. Everybody talks about raising taxes. I want to keep them low but the point is, it wasn't taxes, it was spending. We presided over the largest increase in the size of government since the Great Society and we mortgaged our children's futures, to the great disgrace of the Republican Party. We let earmarking and corrupt spending get to the point where we mortgaged our kids' futures.

And it's going to stop and we have to scrub every agency of government. We have to bring those troops home from Iraq, which we'll be saving money as the conditions permit them to do so with victory and we have to reform defense procurement and we have to do a whole lot of things but spending being out of control and entitlements being very much out of control, in my view, have caused the majority of our deficit problems along with it being the cause of much of our economic difficulties we're in today.

KING: Yes.

MCCAIN: Including greedy Wall Street people, including Congress that didn't do a better job.

KING: You said yesterday that you endorse an Arizona ballot referendum to eliminate affirmative action. Ten years ago, you described a similar effort as "divisive." What changed?

MCCAIN: You know, I don't know what we're talking about. About 10 years ago and I'm going to look it up. But I have a clear record of saying that I approve of helping people progress in America and in the world and I have always opposed a quote "quota" system.

The best, in my view, equal opportunity employer in America is the United States military where we take people who join our military and we give everybody an opportunity and we give them the best training and make them eligible for great educational opportunities.

The problem in America today in my view is we're condemning people who live in poorer communities in America, whether they be inner cities or rural areas, to a terrible education which then limits their opportunities. We've got to have choice and competition. We've got to have charter schools. We've got to have vouchers. We've got to have home schooling. We've got to give people a choice and an opportunity. The same one that Senator Obama had for his children and the same opportunity that Cindy and I had to send our children to the school of our choice and that's what we're condemning so many Americans to today is education which will never give them any the upward mobility and the equal opportunity that they deserve.

So I've always opposed quotas no matter where that quota is taken from.

KING: We're at the end of our agreed-upon time. One quick thing, are you going to campaign a lot with the president? Will you campaign with him a lot?

MCCAIN: I am always glad to be in his company but the fact is it's my campaign as you know and the American people didn't get to know me yesterday and even though I've differed on spending, on climate change, on a long range of issues, campaign finance reform. Other reforms that I have tried to implement on government. Opposition to earmark spending. All of those things. The American people will know me and my agenda for the future and I am very happy with where we are right now, Larry. And I always enjoy being on your show.

KING: Same here.

So you're saying you don't need a partner?

MCCAIN: I'm going to need a partner and I'll name that partner as soon as possible.

KING: Good seeing you, Senator, stay well.

MCCAIN: Thanks again, Larry. Thank you.

Bounds Waffles On Social Security, Refutes McCain Statement That 'All Options Are On The Table' (CNN 07/29/08 9:35am)
MEGYN KELLY: So that comment has struck fear into the hearts of anti-tax conservatives. Has your guy reversed himself?

TUCKER BOUNDS: Well he hasn't reversed himself because he's always been in support of lower taxes. He's never voted in favor of a higher tax. He said again and again that he's not going to raise taxes. But when you're talking about the Social Security debate, you are really talking about a different type of debate, Megyn. You're talking about brining people together to form a compromise. We've seen in this last administration and we've seen time and time again, throughout history of this issue, that if you want to make an honest effort to try to fix Social Security, you're going to have to put everything on the table, have an honest debate, and come together with a real conclusion and a real solution. John McCain is absolutely for maintaining Social Security benefits and that is the number one priority for him. And working forward, we're going to do what we can to fix the problem.

KELLY: Alright but McCain's top economic adviser Douglas Holtz-Eakin says, said before 'McCain will not consider a payroll tax increase' that's what we're talking about quote 'under and imaginable circumstance.' Isnt he not reversing that?

BOUNDS: Well Doug's a much smarter guy than I am and I completely agree with him. And I agree-

KELLY: But your guy doesn't agree with him.

BOUNDS: No well we all agree here that John McCain has never voted in support of higher taxes. Contrary, Barack Obama has voted 94 times in support of higher taxes jus three years in the Senate. That's a stark contrast here.

KELLY: You're off point. We're talking on a go-forward basis. McCain gets in the White House, is he going to raise the payroll tax? Might the Social Security tax go up? Is that on the table?

BOUNDS: No Megyn there is no imaginable circumstance where John McCain would raise payroll taxes. It's absolutely out of the question. Here' s what he said time and time again, he will keep taxes low, he will cut taxes, he will grow jobs and he will try and work to balance the budget. These are the three important things Americans need to know and I may be getting off point here, but it is in stark contrast to Barack Obama who has voted time and time again for higher taxes. And has proposed a slew of new taxes, higher taxes, on the American people.

KELLY: So when McCain said, 'I don't want tax increases but that doesn't mean anything is off the table,' you say in fact what he did mean is new taxes, higher taxes, are off the table.

BOUNDS: What he means is we need to maintain the integrity of the Social Security debate. In order to really take this challenge on, we're going to have to be honest. We're going to have to come to the table, members of Congress are going to have together with the administration, everybody's going to have to work through this and fix Social Security.

KELLY: Tucker, you're waffling again. We need to come together to fix Social Security, is he going to raise the payroll tax to fix Social Security or isn't he? Is that on the table or isn't it?

BOUNDS: Megyn there's no imaginable circumstance where he'd raise taxes. It's not even in his record, it's not in any proposal that he's put forward, I can tell you that with 100% certainty.

Davis Defends "Troops" Ad (MSNBC 07/29/08 7:49am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: Rick, the quote is that you and senator McCain are running a very dishonorable campaign. Respond.

RICK DAVIS: Well, I think that he sounds like he's stunned by the truth and I think that after this eight-day photo-op tour of Europe and the Middle East, the Obama campaign was very unhappy with the fact that they finished the entire tour with a huge mistake, which was blowing off the troops before coming home.

SCARBOROUGH: You say that he is stunned by the truth. What is the truth as you see it? Are you suggesting that Barack Obama does not value the service of our men and women in uniform?

DAVIS: No, I'm sure he does. And I'm sure that our men and women in uniform would have valued the visit that he had indicated early on that he was going to make when he, uh, [coughs] when he arrived . . . I don't know what the truth is because out of the Obama campaign . . . there have been probably eleven separate excuses . . .

SCARBOROUGH: But what do you think at the McCain campaign and what John McCain thinks this signifies? What are you all suggesting this means about Barack Obama, his values and what kind of commander in chief he's going to be?

DAVIS: I think people are going to make their own judgment. This the kind of issue I think will stick around for a while. I think it's up to people who hear the various excuses and evaluate the news reports that you all put out to come to a judgment of their own—

SCARBOROUGH: What judgment?

DAVIS: I'm sure the troops were disappointed the fact he didn't go. There's no clear reason why. Blaming the defense department didn't seem to work, so now they are jumping through various other hoops to try to come up with a good reason . . . I don't think anybody would defend his actions. I mean, you'll notice that's not what they are doing . . .

SCARBOROUGH: Do you think Barack Obama loves his country?

DAVIS: I'm sure Obama loves his country.

[. . .]

DAVIS: . . . John McCain said, if anybody told him he couldn't visit troops in the field, there would be a seismic event, and I believe that.

[. . .]

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: I want to get a sense of why you guys did that ad that some consider -- there is some backlash to it. I mean, there are some who would think that the McCain campaign, you and the McCain campaign are trying to deflect in any desperate way you can from what was a very good trip of Barack Obama, where he was seen on the international stage with world leaders making it work for him.

DAVIS: I'll be the first one to admit Barack Obama has become a global celebrity. I mean, Barack Obama has more fans across the world than Paris Hilton does . . . but I think when he had an opportunity to make a decision based on, you know, his own experience, or lack thereof, you know, he made the wrong choice. Mika, the only backlash I'm noticing on this issue are from people like you and other Obama supporters who are upset that we would actually point out that there was a flaw in an otherwise perfect trip.

BRZEZINSKI: I take issue with that, rick. Hold on one second. I am not "me and other Obama supporters." I'm telling you that this trip went well, it appears that it went well and that was a bad call. I said it on the air yesterday. I thought it was a bad call and it looks bad. In the grand scheme of things—

SCARBOROUGH: Let me step in here. Let me ask you this question: Is it not a good thing that, after seven years of many people in Europe not holding us to the height of esteem, that you have an American politician going to Berlin, a country openly hostile to us in 2002 and 2003 and you saw thousands of American flags waving in the crowd. Isn't that good for America?

DAVIS: Look, believe me, again, I don't know how many times I would have to repeat myself. I think it was great for America's image abroad. I think it shows what kind of popular celebrity that Barack Obama has become. Look, he's not the first politician to go over there. He's just the first politician with fans. John McCain goes to Berlin every year to talk to a series of defense ministers . . . he talks about substance, he pushes back on the Russians, he talks about NATO, he talks about Afghanistan. He doesn't go there and give a flowery speech that has no real substance to it and have 200,000 people. Does that make him any less important to our American fabric abroad?

SCARBOROUGH: Hey, Rick, thank you so much for being with us. We appreciate your insights.

Colbert Chides Candidates for Acting Too Presidential (MSNBC 07/28/08 11:32pm)
STEPHEN COLBERT: And I'm not the only one who noticed the press's bias against John McCain. So has John McCain. Last week his campaign sent an e-mail to reporters saying it's pretty obvious that the media has a bizarre fascination with Barack Obama. Some may even say it's a love affair. This has got to be hard on McCain. It is tough seeing your old flame with someone new. John McCain and the media had a very hot fling back in the summer of 2000. They even had cute little nickname force each other. The press called McCain "maverick" and McCain called the press any time he wanted favorable coverage. [laughter] But John McCain isn't holding a grudge here. No, he's just trying to protect the press, warning them that the new man in their life is not what he appears to be. Because what he appears to be is the president. [laughter, cheers and applause] Obama is giving speeches behind a sort of presidential seal, his new airplane nicknamed "O-Force One". He is even talking like the president.

BARACK OBAMA: Israel is a strong friend of Israel's – [laughter, cheers and applause]

[. . .]

COLBERT: No one has pointed this out more clearly than John McCain.

JOHN MCCAIN: I would love to give a speech in Germany but I much prefer to do it as president of the United States rather than as a candidate for the office of the presidency.

COLBERT: Exactly. When are you just a candidate it is wrong to act like are you the president. Something McCain never does. Just look at this ad.

[ad with "President John McCain" written on side plays]

JOHN MCCAIN: I'm John McCain. and i approve this message.

COLBERT: See? [applause] He's not acting like he's president. He's just saying he's the president. Big difference. By the way, if are you wondering why President McCain is written vertically it so it can be read by his supporters who are mostly bed ridden. [cheers and applause]

CNN: "Is foreign policy a liability for Hillary Clinton?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Leigh Ann Caldwell

July 29, 2014, 7:56 a.m. EDT

Presidential candidates often lack experience in one critical area: foreign policy.

But should she run for president in 2016, Hillary Clinton would have more experience on that front than any other potential presidential competitor.

With experience, however, comes risk. Growing global crises, some of which have festered since Clinton's time as secretary of state, could turn what is seen as one of her assets into a liability.

Unparalleled experience

Of any potential presidential contender, none could match Clinton's experience overseas.

Governors are the most disconnected to foreign policy. Those aspiring for higher office often take international trips to learn about issues. Senators and members of Congress, meanwhile, can beef up their foreign policy cred by serving on committees dealing with international affairs, formulating policies and voting on matters of war, peace and which government to support. But none of that compares to the experience of being directly engaged in global events.

If Clinton does run -- and win -- it would be quite a departure from modern-day political ascension. She would be the first president since James Buchanan, the 15th president, to previously serve as the country's top diplomat. (Although it was almost a requirement closer to the founding of the country, with five of the first eight presidents being previous secretaries of state.)

But Buchanan, who preceded Abraham Lincoln, is considered one of the worst presidents in U.S. history. His failings, however, had nothing to do with his dealings with foreign policy, but with trouble at home over slavery and his reluctance to engage on the issue.

An opening

But Clinton's opponents are sure to make her resume a liability, especially if unrest around the world continues.

Sometimes excessive experience is a liability, especially in political campaigns. It's easier to talk about what you will do with no record to show than it is to explain what you've done.

As unrest around the world unfolds, Republicans will help tell Clinton's story, pointing out contradictions and inconsistencies at every turn.

"It creates an opening for the Republicans," said Alex Wong, former director of foreign policy for Mitt Romney's 2012 presidential run. Wong said candidates won't win an election on foreign policy but they sure could lose one on it.

Before Russia and Ukraine, Israel and Gaza, ISIS gaining ground in Iraq and Syria, Republicans had been homing in on the issue of Benghazi -- the 2012 attack on the U.S. compound that killed four Americans including Ambassador Chris Stevens -- insisting that Clinton knows more than she is willing to admit and that it was her negligence as secretary of state that led to a dangerous environment for Americans working in Libya.

But since international hot spots are flaring, Republicans have more material to work with and more crises at which to point blame.

For instance, after an interview with CNN's "Fareed Zakaria GPS" on Sunday in which Clinton said she was "among the most skeptical of Putin during the time" in the Obama administration, a Republican research organization, America Rising PAC, noted that it's "too late to hit the 'reset' button on your record with Russia."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During her first months at State, Clinton spearheaded an awkward media event in which she and then-Russian President Dmitry Medvedev hit a gimmicky reset button to signal a new start to the U.S.-Russia relationship.

"The dilemma she faces is a failed foreign policy, and she was not influential enough in the administration to right the ship," Wong said.

But Clinton's supporters are anticipating the onslaught of foreign policy-related attacks.

The group Correct the Record, which was created by Clinton supporters to defend her, lists 11 foreign policy-related accomplishments on its website, including helping "restore America's leadership and standing in the world," building a coalition to enact "the toughest sanctions in Iran's history," playing "an integral role" in the missile reduction START treaty with Russia, and supporting the raid to kill Osama bin Laden.

Correct the Record also says Clinton "helped avert all-out war in Gaza" with a cease-fire in 2012.

A tricky paradox

But responding to Republican attacks is only one part of Clinton's challenge to protect and defend her record. She is also undertaking the difficult dance of distancing herself from President Barack Obama's policies while promoting her own, especially as Republicans continue to tie Clinton to what they say is Obama's failed foreign policy.

Clinton is more hawkish than Obama, but working for a President includes having to put your policy positions aside if they don't agree. With possibly higher political aspirations, Clinton must distinguish her positions from those of her former boss.

She wrote a 596-page book to do just that. She used the opportunity to frame the narrative after the events happened, when context and the outcome of her decisions were apparent.

Regarding Russia, in her memoir "Hard Choices," she placed herself in a category within the administration that had more modest expectations, which included progress on some priorities "the reset delivered."

Clinton portrayed her role in negotiations between Israel and Palestinians as a constant broker able to maintain an honest relationship with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu as his and Obama's relationship "continued to deteriorate."

Clinton wrote about phone calls she had with Netanyahu in which they "argued frequently" for more than an hour, "sometimes two."

After failing to extend the freeze on settlement expansion, Clinton wrote, "I spent much of the rest of 2011 trying to keep the situation from deteriorating from deadlock into disaster. That wasn't easy."

Now that Israel and the Palestinians are engaged in intense fighting, Clinton promoted her role as secretary of state while defending the President in her interview on CNN.

"I think the President is doing what he can do to try to get a cease-fire and then see whether we can sort out some, you know, longer-term resolution," she said.

But Aaron David Miller, with the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, said Clinton's role at State is not necessarily an asset but definitely not a liability.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If the world is relatively quiet by the time 2016 rolls around, foreign policy will be at the bottom of most Americans' priority list.

Miller said he admires Clinton for her work in difficult circumstances under a president who didn't give her a lot of latitude. He said she was a good secretary of state who improved America's image around the world but that she isn't "in the category of slam dunk secretaries of state."

"There is not a foreign policy crisis that is currently ongoing that you can directly blame Hillary Clinton for," he said.

That doesn't mean her opponents won't try, though.

Slate blog: Weigel: "The Long Tail of 'Dead Broke'"

By David Weigel

July 29, 2014, 11:58 a.m. EDT

Yesterday, Fusion ran Jorge Ramos's interview with Hillary Clinton about her book, her wealth, and the pre-presidential campaign. Ramos took two hard swings at the wealth issue, and Republican tracking groups popped bottles when she stammered to talk about her "net worth." (She would only allow that her family was worth "millions.") And Ramos also asked if Clinton regretted telling Diane Sawyer that her family was "dead broke" upon leaving the White House.

"I regret it," she said. "It was inartful. It was accurate, but we are so successful and so blessed by the success we had."

Clinton has spent a whole month apologizing for that quote. Right after she gave it, Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel gave her a chance to walk it back, and she did so: "That may have not been the most artful way of saying that, you know, Bill and I have gone through a lot of different phases in our lives." Weeks later, Bill Clinton attacked the "fabricated" narrative around "dead broke," reminding a CNN reporter that the Clintons were piled up with debt in January 2001.

They've got to be sick of this by now. Maggie Haberman had it nailed three weeks ago: Hillary Clinton was "still raw over the partisan wars that hindered her husband's legacy and left the couple with millions of dollars in legal debt." Her answer, as she told Ramos, was accurate, and it's baffling to her that this became a "gaffe." As she continued her tour, HarperCollins was printing up copies of Clinton, Inc, a tell-all by The Weekly Standard's Daniel Halper. On page 18, Halper recalls that in 2001 "the Clintons were broke, owing a fortune in legal fees from the many investigations into their personal lives," and that they had to be loaned $1.3 by Terry McAuliffe. Until just a month ago, that was how even conservatives remembered the Clintons' departure from the White House.

But a conservative author could call the Clintons "broke." Hillary Clinton could not. In the sprawling world of Clinton defenders (who I spent some time with, for a story going up later) this is deeply annoying.

America Rising, a Republican-aligned opposition research group, blasted out a clip this morning of Hillary Clinton being asked about her wealth for the bajillionth time (NOTE: This is a rough estimate). This time the interviewer was Jorge Ramos, an anchor for Fusion, in an interview set to air Tuesday night.

And, yet again, she seemed caught somewhat off guard in her answer. Here's the clip.

And, here's the transcript of that exchange -- courtesy of David Ford at Fusion.

Ramos: Do you know your net worth? Do you know how much money you have?

Clinton: You know, within a range, yeah. I mean, we have two very nice houses which we're very proud of and not selling anytime soon so...

Ramos: But millions…

Clinton: Yeah. Yes, yes, indeed.

Um, ok. Again, it just seems hard for me to believe that Clinton, who has been repeatedly battered in the media -- and by conservative critics -- about her comments about her wealth doesn't have a clearer answer to questions like the one posed by Ramos. Clinton, in response to Ramos' question about how much money she had exactly, could have easily said some version of this: "I don't have an exact number at the tip of my tongue, Jorge. It's plenty. We've been very blessed in our lives. But, I've also spent my entire life fighting for those less fortunate than Bill and I."

In fact, Clinton said many of those things in response to Ramos' previous question about whether she regretted telling ABC's Diane Sawyer that she and her husband were "dead broke" when they left the White House. Here's how Clinton, effectively, handled that question:

“I regret it. It was inartful. It was accurate but we are so successful and we're so blessed by the success we've had and my husband has worked incredibly hard. What I worry about is not my family. I worry about other families in our country who feel like they're running in place. They're not getting ahead or maybe they're falling backwards. And what I want to do and this is what Bill has always done from the very beginning of his public life is to try to create more ladders of opportunity for more Americans so that they can have the same opportunities that Bill and I have had.”

While Clinton could have probably done without the "it was accurate" line, this answer is MUCH better than the one she went on to give Ramos in response to how rich she actually is. Politicians repeat themselves all the time. If Clinton had basically rephrased this first answer when responding to the second question, she would have been in great shape.

It's more than just Clinton's words that aren't great in that second answer though. She seems visibly uncomfortable when asked directly about how much money she and her husband have. I'm not sure it merits the "Clinton stutters, still unwilling to own up to her wealth" description that America Rising uses in their blog post on the clip, but it's certainly a moment where you can tell Clinton is not entirely comfortable. (Adrienne Elrod, communications director for Correct The Record, an outside group designed to counter attacks on Clinton, described the America Rising clip as "another desperate, ineffective attempt by the right wing to distract from the fact that Hillary Clinton has spent her lifetime in public service lifting up the lives of middle-class families.")

Being wealthy is not the problem for politicians. (The vast majority of people who run for president are millionaires, and many are far wealthier than that.) It's how comfortable (or not) they are talking about their wealth that gets them into trouble (or not). Mitt Romney is the ur-example of a politician who could just never talk about his wealth in a way that worked for him rather than against him. Every time someone asked about his affluence, he looked like he was undergoing a painful medical procedure as he answered. His awkwardness when talking about his money led to more questions about it. Which led to more awkwardness. And so on and so forth. It was a vicious cycle.

To be clear, Clinton is not Mitt Romney. Romney's wealth -- and his inability to put to rest the idea that it was representative of a mindset in which he looked out for his wealthy friends first and foremost -- became the defining issue of the 2012 presidential campaign. Unlike Romney, Clinton's wealth largely comes from speeches and book sales not the venture capital business from which Romney made his fortune. And, Clinton can effectively make the case that she has spent the vast majority of the last two decades -- from her time as First Lady to her time in the Senate to her tenure as Secretary of State -- serving the American public first and foremost.

Still, Clinton's struggles to answer what seem like pretty basic questions about her wealth remain baffling -- particularly for a politician as practiced in the art as she is. Until she finds three sentences (or so) to button up any/all questions about her wealth, those questions will keep coming. And that's not the way Clinton wants to run-up to her now all-but-certain presidential bid.

Fusion: "Hillary Clinton regrets saying she was 'dead broke,' feels blessed by success"

By America With Jorge Ramos

July 28, 2014, 6:38 p.m. EDT

It was the answer that spawned a wave of new questions.

When Hillary Clinton told Diane Sawyer that she and Bill Clinton were "dead broke" when they left the White House, a debate began over whether the statement was really accurate and if the potential presidential candidacy of Hillary Clinton would be able to connect with the problems of average Americans -- given the hefty Clinton bank account today.

In an interview with Fusion's Jorge Ramos, Hillary Clinton said that she regrets the comment.

"It was accurate but we are so successful and we're so blessed by the success we've had and my husband has worked incredibly hard," Clinton said. "What I worry about is not my family. I worry about other families in our country who feel like they're running in place."

Polls taken after the controversy have shown that most Americans still believe that Clinton can relate with everyday Americans and their problems. Clinton is sure to face continued inquiries about her wealth and taxes. Ramos asked Clinton if she knows her net worth.

"You know, within a range, yeah," Clinton said. "I mean, we have two very nice houses which we're very proud of and not selling anytime soon."

As the Washington Post's Dan Balz noted, the most important takeaway from the uproar may be that Hillary Clinton's political instincts look rusty, and she faces a broader challenge of turning her years of experience into a campaign that energizes voters. That's all if she announces that she's running in the first place, of course.

CNN: "Hillary Clinton on her 'dead broke' misstep: 'I regret it'"

By Dan Merica

July 29, 2014, 11:40 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton first opened the can of worms on her sizable wealth during the first interview of her book tour on June 9.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nearly two months later, Clinton is still being asked about it and tells Fusion that she regrets telling ABC's Diane Sawyer that her family was 'dead broke' when they left the White House in 2001.

"Well, I regret it. It was in-artful," she told Fusion's Jorge Ramos in a portion of an interview posted Monday night. "It was accurate but we are so successful and we're so blessed by the success we've had and my husband has worked incredibly hard."

Clinton then pivoted from her personal wealth and previous comments to what she hopes to do in the future for people struggling to get out of debt.

"What I worry about is not my family. I worry about other families in our country who feel like they're running in place, they're not getting ahead or maybe they are falling backwards," Clinton said. "What I want to do–and this is what Bill has always done since the very beginning of his public life–is to try to create more ladders of opportunity for more Americans so that they can have the same opportunities that Bill and I have had."

Clinton's comments about being “dead broke” and in debt in 2001 rang hollow to many given the fact the family had two massive book advances in the works, a sizable government pension, and the prospect of making millions on the speaking circuit in their future.

Clinton has called her comments in-artful a number of times, including the day after her first interview.

"That may have not been the most artful way of saying that you know Bill and I have gone through a lot of different phases in your lives," Clinton said at an event with Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel.

Both Bill and Hillary Clinton, however, have accurately stood by the fact that their family was in debt after leaving the White House. According to financial disclosure forms, the Clintons had between $2.28 million to $10.6 million in debt in 2001.

Former President Bill Clinton recently told an audience that that amount of debt "would qualify as being dead broke."

But the Clintons didn't stay in debt for long.

A CNN analysis of the family's financial records in early 2013 showed that Bill Clinton had earned $106 million from paid speeches since leaving the presidency behind. Bloomberg reported earlier this month that Hillary Clinton has earned $12 million speaking and writing since leaving the state department in 2013.

Questions about Clinton's wealth have persisted for the last two months. Republicans seized on the talking point in an effort to paint the former secretary of state and possible 2016 presidential hopeful as out of touch with everyday Americans, and reporters have continued to press to see how much money the Clintons have made since leaving public service.

Ramos, whose full interview with Clinton will air Tuesday night, also asked Clinton if she knew her net worth.

"Within a range," Clinton said. "We have two very nice houses which we are very proud of."

When asked if the figure was in the millions, Clinton responded, "Yes, indeed."

Huffington Post: "Hillary Clinton: 'I Regret' Saying We Were 'Dead Broke'"

By Paige Lavender

July 29, 2014, 11:31 a.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said she regrets saying she and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, were "dead broke" upon leaving the White House.

"I regret it. It was inartful," Clinton said in an interview on Fusion's "AMERICA with Jorge Ramos." "It was accurate but we are so successful and we're so blessed by the success we've had and my husband has worked incredibly hard."

Clinton, who noted she and her husband are "indeed" worth millions, said she doesn't worry about her financial situation like she worries about families across the United States.

"What I worry about is not my family. I worry about other families in our country who feel like they're running in place. They're not getting ahead or maybe they're falling backwards," Clinton said. "And what I want to do, and this is what Bill has always done from the very beginning of his public life, is to try to create more ladders of opportunity for more Americans so that they can have the same opportunities that Bill and I have had."

Former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton says she regrets saying that she and husband Bill Clinton left the White House "dead broke" in 2001.

"I regret it. It was inartful. It was accurate. But, we are so successful and we are so blessed by the success we've had. And my husband has worked incredibly hard," Hillary Clinton told Fusion TV's Jorge Ramos in an interview Monday.

Clinton told ABC's Diane Sawyer in a June interview, "We came out of the White House not only dead broke, but in debt." The former first lady cited legal fees that she and her husband had to pay during his White House tenure.

Clinton said she worries about the economic outlook of "other families in our country who feel like they are running in place," not her own family.

The former secretary of state said she knows her net worth "within a range" but declined to offer a specific estimate.

"But millions?" Ramos asked her.

Clinton responded: "Yes, indeed."

[Subtitle:] The former secretary of state — who has already landed herself in trouble over comments about her wealth — says she owns 'two very nice houses' but doesn't elaborate further.

Hillary Clinton stopped short of asking "what difference does it make?" when asked Monday if she knew her exact net worth.

"You know, within a range, yeah," she told Fusion TV's Jorge Ramos when he inquired if the former secretary of state knew the sum of her assets.

"I mean, we have two very nice houses which we're very proud of and not selling anytime soon," a slightly annoyed Clinton added.

Clinton discussed her new book "Hard Choices" and also heaped scorn on former Vice President Dick Cheney - who co-authored a Wall Street Journal op-ed in June criticizing President Obama's policy in Iraq.

"He should've been talking about himself, shouldn't he?" Clinton said of George W. Bush's chief cheerleader for the 2003 invasion.

"I don't know why he's saying what he's saying, and clearly we don't need that kind of vitriol and finger pointing."

Then Sen. Clinton (D-N.Y.) supported W. Bush's Iraq invasion in 2003 but upon reflection calls her support "a mistake."

"I gave (President Bush) the benefit of the doubt in area where I should not have, and then the initial decision was wrong, and then the follow-up that they did inside Iraq made it even worse."

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: "Clinton declines to detail net worth"

By Rebecca Shabad

July 29, 2014, 10:53 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton declined to specify her net worth in an interview, sidestepping questions about her family's wealth ahead of a possible 2016 presidential run.

In the interview with Fusion posted Monday evening, Clinton, considered the Democratic frontrunner if she decides to run, was asked how much money she has.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Ummm, you know within a range,” Clinton said. “You know we have two very nice houses that we’re very proud of, which we’re not selling anytime soon.”

“But millions?” the interviewer pressed.

“Yeah, yes, indeed,” confirmed Clinton.

Clinton came under fire in early June, as she launched a national book tour for her memoir Hard Choices, for claiming that she and former President Bill Clinton left the White House “dead broke” and “in debt.”

She told Fusion she regrets making those statements.

“I regret it, it was inartful,” she said. “It was accurate but we are so successful and we're so blessed by the success we've had and my husband has worked incredibly hard.

“What I worry about is not my family,” she continued. “I worry about other families in our country who feel like they're running in place. They’re not getting ahead.”

Clinton told ABC News’s Diane Sawyer last month that her family left the White House in 2001 “dead broke.”

"We came out of the White House not only dead broke, but in debt," Clinton said. "We had no money when we got there, and we struggled to, you know, piece together the resources for mortgages, for houses, for Chelsea's education. You know, it was not easy."

The day after the interview aired, she clarified and also defended her remarks, claiming she and Bill are “obviously blessed.”

The former president later came to his wife’s defense, saying that she was not “out of touch.”

Fusion: “Hillary Clinton on 2016: 'I think there will probably be many candidates'”

By America With Jorge Ramos

July 29, 2014, 12:21 a.m. EDT

Many observers think it's a foregone conclusion that Hillary Clinton will get the nod in the 2016 Democratic primary. Leaving aside her coyness on whether she will actually run, Fusion's Jorge Ramos asked Clinton whether she thinks her party would benefit from a competitive primary.

"Well, I think there will probably be many candidates," Clinton said. "I mean, I'm somebody who believes anybody can run."

Clinton certainly remembers President Obama's sudden rise from one-term senator to Democratic front-runner during in 2008, but she still sees the value of the primary gauntlet. Competitive primaries can often help energize a party's base around a candidate and steel their campaign for the general election, provided the primary winner avoids gaffes and extreme positions won't sit well with crucial swing voters. Such a political trial would be a welcome part of her potential campaign, Clinton told Ramos.

"I'm not sure I'm going to run but if I do, I think competition is healthy and if people want to get in and want to be in a primary, more power to them," Clinton said.

Fusion: "Hillary Clinton disses Cheney, says 'Iraq was a mistake'"

By America With Jorge Ramos

July 28, 2014, 6:46 p.m. EDT

In her new book, Hillary Clinton writes that she got Iraq wrong. Her 2008 supporters may wonder what took her so long.

"Iraq was a mistake," Clinton said. "I gave [President Bush] the benefit of the doubt in area where I should not have, and then the initial decision was wrong, and then the follow-up that they did inside Iraq made it even worse."

Ramos also asked Clinton about Dick Cheney's Wall Street Journal op-ed, written with his daughter Liz, criticizing President Obama's policies in Iraq, Afghanistan, and the wider Middle East, saying that "rarely has a U.S. president been so wrong about so much at the expense of so many."

"He should've been talking about himself, shouldn't he?" Clinton said. "I don't know why he's saying what he's saying, and clearly we don't need that kind of vitriol and finger pointing."

"One of the things we've lost over the last few years is that idea where we're going to have our differences but when we face problems, whether they're humanitarian problems, terrorist problems, whatever they might be, we need to come together and work together and we need to have a nonpartisan approach," Clinton continued. "And he keeps trying to inject a personal and partisan approach where it doesn't belong."

Mediaite: "Hillary Hits Cheney for Obama Criticism: 'Should've Been Talking About Himself'"

By Matt Wilstein

July 29, 2014, 9:59 a.m. EDT

In another preview from her interview with Jorge Ramos, set to air tonight on Fusion, Hillary Clinton offered up a strong defense of President Barack Obama in the face of criticism from former Vice President Dick Cheney. In response to Cheney's assertion about Obama that "rarely has a U.S. president been so wrong about so much at the expense of so many," Clinton said, "He should've been talking about himself, shouldn't he?"

"I don't know why he's saying what he's saying, and clearly we don't need that kind of vitriol and finger pointing," Clinton continued. "One of the things we've lost over the last few years is that idea where we're going to have our differences but when we face problems, whether they're humanitarian problems, terrorist problems, whatever they might be, we need to come together and work together and we need to have a nonpartisan approach. And he keeps trying to inject a personal and partisan approach where it doesn't belong."

On the issue of Iraq, Clinton reiterated the regret she expresses in her book Hard Choices. "I made a mistake," she said, adding that she gave President George W. Bush "the benefit of the doubt in area where I should not have, and then the initial decision was wrong, and then the follow-up that they did inside Iraq made it even worse."

Troy Record (N.Y.): "Crowds round the corner in wait for Hillary Clinton arrival at Northshire Bookstore"

By Paul Post

July 29, 2014, 10:42 a.m. EDT

People from Albany to Manchester, Vt. got up early and drove more than an hour Tuesday for a chance to meet former First Lady, U.S. Senator and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

Hundreds of people formed a long line around the block, from Northshire Bookstore where Clinton is signing her book, "Hard Choices," all the way down Caroline Street to Maple Avenue.

For most people, making time to meet the possible next president of the United States wasn't a hard choice at all.

"I think she's wonderful; she'd be an awesome president," said Molly Zeif, of Manchester, who is currently studying political science and international relations.

Mary Browne, of Berne, said she left home at 7 a.m. to meet Clinton.

"I'm 75," she said. "Let's not waste time. If she's going to be our next president I'd like to say hi. I've met every one of them, starting with Jimmy Carter. I worked on a Habitat for Humanity project with him in South Dakota."

Browne said she believes Clinton would make an exceptional president.

"She'll have a balanced outlook on things," she said. "It's exciting to think of a woman in the presidency."

However, not everyone agrees. Two protestors marched down the opposite side Caroline Street, from the book-signing line, holding posters that read: "Benghazi: We will not forget" and "Hillary: Whitewater Witch."

"She's going to be our next president," a Clinton supporter yelled back.

Saratoga Springs police and Saratoga County Sheriff's Office deputies patrolled the area on foot and in cars. Of course, Clinton has her own security, too.

"Mrs. Clinton and Secret Service come as a package deal," city police Lt. Sean Briscoe said.

Only people who purchased books – $29.95 apiece – were allowed to enter the store for Clinton's signing. First they had to stand in line for a wrist band; then wait to get their book signed. Clinton did not hold a press conference and visitors were not permitted to engage her in conversation or ask questions.

Josh Vellozzi, of Albany, made a special trip to Saratoga Springs a few weeks ago to buy "Hard Choices" and came back again Tuesday to meet its author.

"She's going to be the next president; that's a good enough reason," he said. "And to be around a powerful woman, too."

"I'm hoping she runs," said Jeff McLellan, of Saratoga Springs. "It's really an opportunity to meet with a political person of national prominence."

Teachers Laura Lewis and Danielle Lambert said they can't wait to share their experience with students this fall.

"Its' really exciting," said Lewis, who teaches ninth grade world history at Schuylerville.

Lambert, of Saratoga Springs, teaches social studies in Gloversville.

"It's a huge opportunity to go back to our classes and say, 'You, too, could meet a world leader,' " she said.

Washington Free Beacon: "Allen West: 'Allow Israel To Crush Hamas'"

By Larry O'Connor

July 29, 2014, 10:27 a.m. EDT

Former congressman Lt. Col. Allen West says the United States "should allow Israel to crush Hamas."

Appearing on WMAL radio in Washington, D.C., West told co-host Brian Wilson and Larry O'Connor, "We should sit down with … all those who understand that this move of radical Islamism in the Middle East has to be crushed."

Leveling harsh criticism on President Obama and Secretary of State John Kerry, West questioned whether the world knows whose side we are on in the Middle East.

"He has been an absolute catastrophe," West said with regard to Kerry. "President Obama, I don't understand who he sides with. We have fled Libya because the 'militia and rebels' who we supported have now caused us to get out of Libya because they are Islamists," West continued. "He supported the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and now that General el-Sisi has gotten rid of the Muslim Brotherhood, he does not want to support Egypt."

"We are on the wrong side in the Middle East," he concluded. "Israel sees it."

West's criticism of the Obama administration didn't stop at their policies toward Israel. He turned his focus on our crumbling influence in Europe and Russia's continued aggression in that region.

“A person like Hillary Clinton should not be in the White House because she does not want to take leadership role,” West said when speaking about the former secretary of state’s presidential ambitions. “Maybe she wants to give Vladimir Putin another little toy box with a red button on top of it and say ‘hey, let’s play reset again.”

“We need to have someone like a Ronald Reagan to stand up at a Brandenburg Gate and say ‘Mr. Gorbachev, tear down this wall’ because right now Vladimir Putin is attempting to rebuild it.”

Subject:	attn Andrew Rosenthal & New York Times Op Ed--"Homecare Rules in the Homestretch

Dear Editor;

In your editorial, "Homecare Rules in the Homestretch," you fail to understand the reality of living on government funded Medicaid, and the Russian Roulette pistol aimed at the heads of the Seniors, People with Disabilities and our Home Care Workers who depend on it, every year when budgets are cut. Although overtime pay would be great for IHSS providers, in publicly funded Medicaid programs, states that are cutting IHSS (In Home Supportive Services) are not likely to provide overtime pay and will instead most likely cut hours worked above 159 hours a month for any one provider. There is a big move to push through these Department of Labor rules as written right now with no consideration of how they'll really play out in the homes of Seniors and People with Disabilities and their Caregivers in New York and California where people have over 159 hours of IHSS a month.
I know of a proud union member, a mother over 60, who has multiple disabilities of her own and takes care of her adult son with athetoid cerebral palsy who will see her household income of about $2520 a month in California drop to $1431, as her hours are cut from 280 hours a month to 159 hours. She doesn't have the stamina to supplement her income with more jobs and she has trouble finding other caregivers because her son cannot be understood very well by others. The union has taken over $40 a month from her for check each month to lobby for what will cut her income by a pretty big fraction. Jerry Brown just got done settling a lawsuit trying to cut the IHSS program in California by 20% and settled for cutting it by about 8 percent. Do you really think he's going to take time and a half for over 50,000 providers? His representative on an Olmsted conference said they wouldn't.

When I was in the Young Socialist Alliance in college, before I had my accident, I believed in theories in a vacuum. Then I became disabled and saw how these things work out on a real-life level. In California, we have the most highly advanced In-Home Supportive Services program, and the reason it was so good is that the disabled person received money to find somebody and all of that money went directly to the caregiver. The attendant got all the bang for the buck. And while ADAPT American Disabled for Attendant Programs Today was fighting to get In Home Care, this wonderful program to all the states, they came up with things like "Money Follows the Person" and "Community First Choice Option" where that money continued to go to the disabled person to pay directly to their caregiver with no middleman.

But suddenly all kinds of profiteering is going on as big bad corporations and yes even sometimes big bad unions behaviors are immerging as monied interests smell a beautiful dollar to be made in the graying of the baby boomers. On a good day the union is our greatest blessing on a bad day they are our greatest curse. The only way to come up with a reasonable solution that takes everyone's welfare into account is to sit down and work it out. I think what's been most frightening to me in all of this is the ease with which able-bodied regard People with Disabilities as invisible. The SEIU would not even sit down at the table with People with Disabilities to work out a compromise. Would this happen to a person of color? Are we the last population to be seen as a fraction of a person -- or a person who is really there at all?

People have been making industries of people with disabilities for decades, in the nursing home industry, the charity industry, and now the medical industrial complex and the unions too on a bad day. People from ADAPT clawed our ways out of nursing homes that were profiteering off of us and now we have to fight against the nursing agency industry, managed care corporations, and even at times a union that is so out of touch with its rank and file providers needs that it would create three crappy jobs from one not so good one in order to collect two or three union dues on a one house. It is the people disabilities and rank-and-file providers, who are in a symbiotic relationship, huddled together to keep industries and unions from objectifying us "furniture" in their business plans. You can choose to be naïve and come up with lovely little fairy lands in your own mind, but make no mistake, your naïveté will be paid for by the rank-and-file workers whose pay will be cut badly and people with disabilities who will go back to nursing homes.

The ADAPT-NCIL compromise would simply eliminate the exemption for third party employers, treating Medicaid consumers in consumer directed programs (including public authorities, fiscal intermediaries and agencies with choice) the same as private employers so they can still use the existing exemption. According to the DOL analysis, this change - alone - would eliminate the companionship exemption for 70% of home care workers. It covers all of the "bad players" and concerns raised in the DOL analysis that exist in traditional home care while minimizing the negative impact on people with disabilities and preventing the unexpected consequences such changes would have on real live people in Medicaid funded programs.

Where were our points of view in this newspaper? In the DOL discussions? Why include us? It's only our bodies and freedom. If anyone had any respect for people with disabilities we would've included us in the discussion.

People with Disabilities and their Caregivers in New York and California where people have over 160 hours of IHSS a month.

In California where 70% of caregivers are family providers, IHSS makes it possible for families to stay intact when they have a senior family member or a family members with a disability, who needs in-home care. These families could see their household income drop dramatically. Significantly disabled people with over 160 hours could lose loyal live-in and live out caregivers they've had for decades, because their work hours will be cut below the money they need to live. Or people with severe disabilities may not be able to get providers to help them when one of the providers needs to leave, because the remaining providers will be in danger working overtime. The unintended consequences of this unbalanced approach to the way private and public in-home supportive services are paid could lead to widespread misery in publicly funded In-Home Supportive Services.

Senior and Disability Rights Advocates were not included in discussions where these Department of Labor rules were developed. Now, the National Council on Disability is trying to explain this to those who can make a difference. Their letter is printed below. The NCIL/ADAPT compromise could be a win-win solution for everyone, where privately funded agencies would have different rules than in publicly funded Medicaid In-Home Supportive Services in states where finite revenues determine what can be paid. "Our compromise creates a win-win solution, covers 70% of attendants and allows us all to be at the table for further discussion," says Bruce Darling of CDR ADAPT.

Below see the Letter from the National Council on Disability about these possible negative unintended consequences. http://www.ncd.gov/publications/2013/03192013/ The Disability and Senior communities and the rank-and-file IHSS providers in New York and California do not seem to of been fully informed or permitted to give input about the impact of this law as written. If after reading this letter, you feel the Office of Management and Budget should delay changing these rules until they consult with Disability And Senior Communities and make sure it won't cut the number of hours providers are permitted to work in publicly funded programs,

The draft BSA lays the foundation for leaving U.S military forces in Afghanistan after the end of 2014. It is expected to involve 8,000 to 10,000 U.S. troops with counterterrorism, training, and other responsibilities in support of Afghan forces.

for the Afghan security forces and for Afghanistan's economic development simply will not materialize. Without this assistance, few believe any Afghan government can survive for very long. So the stakes are high -- for Afghanistan, and for preserving the investment of lives and treasure that the United States and its coalition allies have made over the last twelve years.

> Initially President Karzai said he would sign the BSA after its approval by a traditional convocation of Afghan leaders called a Loya Jirga. The BSA received overwhelming approval, But Karzai nonetheless declined to sign. He has required further concessions: an end to counterterrorism raids into Afghan homes at night, active U.S. support for the peace process with the Taliban, and non-interference in the April election to choose President Karzai's successor. Lately he has threatened not to sign at all and to leave it to his successor.

> U.S. officials have responded by pressuring President Karzai directly and indirectly and setting a succession of missed deadlines, most recently saying that the BSA must be signed in "weeks, not months." So far, nothing has worked. U.S. officials need an alternative approach.

> First, he would praise Afghanistan's progress in assuming greater responsibility for its security, in improving the education, health, and well-being of its citizens, and in preparing for the upcoming Presidential election. He would state that, to support that progress, he has directed U.S. forces to curtail all but essential night raids, he is committed to facilitating the peace process, and pledges full support for an April election free from all outside influences.

> These statements would not represent a major U.S. policy change, but together they would offer President Karzai a face saver if in fact he wishes to sign the BSA.

> This step would go a long way to reassuring the candidates for the Afghan Presidency and the Afghan people of America's post-2014 presence. The lack of such reassurance has become a source of serious instability, threatening the success of the Afghan election and the morale of the Afghan security forces. For similar reasons, President Obama should resist any pressure to set at this point a date for the termination of the U.S. post-2014 deployment.

> Third, President Obama would state that while he is willing to sign the BSA with President Karzai, he is also willing to sign it post-April with a new Afghan President. U.S. officials should then stop pressuring President Karzai -- or anyone else -- for a signature before the April election. Such pressure only strengthens President Karzai's hand, encourages further delay, and makes the United States look weak and desperate.

>

> President Obama should make clear in his statement that his troop commitment is dependent upon the ultimate signature of the BSA. But a post-election April or May signing by a new Afghan president would give more than enough time to complete the necessary U.S. military planning before the end of the year. Indeed, informed experts say that even without the BSA, U.S. forces could remain in Afghanistan after 2014 under the existing Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA) (although our allies would have to negotiate a new SOFA for their forces with the new Afghan government).

> Recent polling suggests that over 60% of the American people believe the Afghan war was not worth fighting. But the same poll suggests that 55% support leaving some U.S. forces for training and "anti-insurgency" operations. And public statements by members suggest that a post-2014 deployment would have bipartisan Congressional support.

>

> President Obama should avoid any suggestion that he might embrace a "zero option" and leave no U.S. troops post-2014. Almost every Afghan expert believes it would destabilize Afghanistan, place the Presidential election in doubt, and ultimately risk the collapse of the Afghan security forces. It would profoundly affect U.S. security interests. Afghanistan would become once again a safe haven for terrorists -- who, history shows, would

PM Blasts 'Shocking' Tape of Wedding Feting Duma Murders

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Wednesday night denounced a "shocking" video clip showing far-right extremists celebrating the killings of the Dawabsheh family, joining dozens of other politicians and public figures coming out against the taped incident. Politicians from both sides of the political aisle strongly condemned the clip showing revelers at the Jerusalem celebration waving knives, rifles, pistols and a Molotov cocktail during the wedding. Amid the festivities, a photo of the Dawabsheh baby who was burned to death in the firebombing is shown being repeatedly stabbed.

Shin Bet on Torture Allegations: Interrogations Prevent Attacks

Shin Bet alluded to the use of violent interrogation methods on the Jewish youths suspected of the Duma arson-murder in a rare statement issued on Thursday. At the same time, Shin Bet denied allegations of sexually harassing or degrading the detainees. The current investigation involves "uncovering plans for future attacks," the Shin Bet said. "With that in mind and in coordination with the judicial system, the group has been investigated according to established and professional judicial criteria for forestalling dangerous attacks in the future."

Three Israelis Wounded in Two West Bank Attacks

Two Israeli soldiers were lightly wounded in an apparent car-ramming attack north of the Ofra settlement in the West Bank on Friday afternoon. The driver was shot and killed. The soldiers were treated at the scene and then evacuated to Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem. An hour earlier, 20-year-old Israeli soldier was stabbed during clashes between security forces and Palestinians in the West Bank village of Kfar Abboud, near the settlement of Halamish. He was rushed to Sheba Medical Center in Tel Hashomer with moderate to serious wounds.

Two Israelis Killed Outside Old City Walls, One Seriously Injured

Two Israeli civilians were killed and a third was seriously injured yesterday in a stabbing attack outside the walls of the Old City of Jerusalem. Two assailants from East Jerusalem reportedly drew knives on the promenade outside Jaffa Gate and began to stab passers-by. Two border policewomen who were stationed nearby rushed to the scene and shot the assailants with pistols. One of the assailants died immediately and the other died a short time afterwards in hospital. One of the victims, Ofer Ben-Ari, who saw the attack and tried to ward off the assailants, was struck by one of the bullets fired by the Border Policewomen. He died a few hours later from his injuries.

Israeli Arabs Charged w/ Planning Attack at Golani Junction

Two relatives, Mohammed Hassan and Ahmad Saida, were charged Thursday morning with supporting the Islamic State and planning a terror attack at the Golani Junction in the Galilee. Hassan, 20, is a resident of the village Reineh, while Saida, 23, is a resident of the town Shibli–Umm al-Ghanam, both in the Galilee region. The two defendants traveled to Turkey last May where they met with an ISIS operative and tried to enter Syria. When they arrived at the border and met refugees who told them of the horrors happening in Syria, they changed their minds and returned to Israel.

Senior Israeli Official Calls Out PA for Honoring Samir Kuntar

A senior Israeli government official blasted the Palestinian Authority for honoring assassinated Hezbollah arch-terrorist Samir Kuntar in Ramallah on Tuesday. "When leading members of the PA put a cold-blooded killer of children on a pedestal and portray him as a hero, they are demonstrating before the world that they have yet to exorcise terrorism from within," the official told The Algemeiner on Wednesday evening, mere hours after a stabbing attack left two Israelis dead and another critically wounded. "We see this also in their justification for the ongoing terror attacks against Israeli civilians, which today alone exacted a heavy price."

Violent Clashes Between IDF and Palestinians in West Bank

During IDF activity in the Qalandiya refugee camp, in which soldiers came to arrest suspects in a shooting attack, the forces were assaulted by a violent mob, the army says. The troops were shot at and had an explosive device, Molotov cocktails, and rocks thrown at them, the IDF says. "In response to the immediate danger, the force fired toward the gunmen. Hits were confirmed," an IDF spokeswoman says. During the scuffle, one soldier, approximately 20 years old, was lightly injured when he was struck in the head by rocks thrown at the troops, the Magen David Adom rescue service says.

Syrian Government Ready to Join UN Talks to End Conflict

A close adviser to Syrian President Bashar al Assad said on Wednesday Damascus was ready to join U.N.-sponsored peace talks with its position bolstered by both Russian backing and the West's retreat from a hardline anti-Assad approach. Bouthaina Shaaban said her government approved of U.N. resolutions passed last week endorsing an international road map for a Syria peace process, a rare display of unity among global powers on a conflict that has killed more than 250,000 people. "We accept these resolutions," she told Beirut-based al Mayadeen television in the first official Syrian remarks on the matter.

A Nation Put to the Test

By Yoaz Hendel

Anyone who wants to see what insanity looks like and has a strong stomach ought to watch the video from the wedding. Young Jewish men who look like members of Hamas screaming and stabbing the picture of a murdered baby. There is no difference between them and the Muslim lunatics around us. The only difference is us—Israel's ability to fight those phenomena without balking.

The war on Palestinian terrorism has been part of our lives for the past 100 years. There isn't anyone here who hasn't paid a personal price; there isn't anyone who isn't troubled by that terrorism. Two Israelis were murdered yesterday. Tomorrow they'll try again. This is a tenacious war. The last thing the security forces need is to have to deal with Jewish terrorism on top of that.

Regrettably, there isn't any other choice. The damage that is caused by Jewish terrorism and its supporters is enormous, not only to the morality but to the very foundations of our commonwealth. The problematic part of this story is that the defense minister actually needed to play a recording in order to persuade the public leaders in Judea and Samaria that the extreme right wing poses a risk to them and the State of Israel. For far too long the right wing has played down its own problems. It preferred not to deal with them. That was a fateful error. They have become the fire that is now threatening to burn everything down.

It isn't soul-searching that is needed over every Jewish Ku Klux Klan video nor do we need to engage in political sparring. What is needed is a tenacious fight against the post-Zionist right wing, and for a clear line to be drawn between it and all the rest. I write that without hesitation. It no longer pains me to do so. They have no part in the things I believe in. That is not what any Judaism I know looks like; that is not what the Zionist movement that brought my family here looks like. They aren't my partners in either the standing army or the reserves; they aren't going to defend me in the next war and they aren't going to be happy along with me when the Israeli team wins a game.

Several positive processes have nevertheless begun in the midst of all that chaos. Clear lines now separate between the stately [i.e., those who are committed to the political Zionist agenda] and those who pose a danger. Political leaders have begun to take responsibility. The first person on the right to dare to open his mouth was Naftali Bennett.

It is my impression that Bennett has recently undergone a change. He recognizes the strategic damage posed by the zealots, the damage that they are doing to the religious Zionist camp. Perhaps he has built up enough courage to show the responsibility that goes hand in hand with leadership. Bennett spoke out in support of the GSS without stammering. Two hours later the prime minister mustered the courage to follow in his footsteps.

One need only look at the comments on Bennett's Facebook page to realize that the celebrants at that crazed wedding are representatives of a broader phenomenon. Phenomena of that kind exist everyplace in the world. Regrettably, in that sense, we are a people like every other people. The test of a nation is its ability to combat that.

Hezbollah's Fears Beyond the Killing of Samir Kuntar

By Hanin Ghaddar

The assassination of Samir Kuntar earlier this week was a major slap on the face for Hezbollah and Iran — not because Kuntar is dead but because their support base in Lebanon and the region now understand their complicated alliance with Russia. Accordingly, Iran's increasing vulnerability in Syria will be gradually exposed and this will further shake any remaining trust Shiites in the region have for Iran and Hezbollah.

This week, Shiites — mainly in Lebanon — face the bitter fact that Russia allowed Israel to assassinate Kuntar. Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah's speech following Kuntar's funeral was beyond lame. He spoke about Kuntar for four cold minutes before proceeding to lash out for over 20 minutes about Shiites in Nigeria and the US sanctions against the Party of God. Nasrallah is actually more concerned about three issues.

First, U.S. sanctions against Hezbollah were recently increased. Some economic analysts in Lebanon say that the purpose of these sanctions is to make sure Hezbollah does not receive much-needed money after the sanctions against Iran are lifted, and Hezbollah's Sayyed is certainly concerned about that prospect. Without money to pay for social services, fighters and their families, he and his party are doomed. Today, pro-Hezbollah papers and media leaked news that entailed a clear threat to the banks in Lebanon.

Second, Hezbollah is more crippled than ever with the new and complicated alliances over Syria and Iraq. Nasrallah already knows that retaliation against Israel that could start another war is out of the question, yet some kind of retaliation is needed — something like the one following Jihad Mughniyeh's assassination last year. But the Iran deal, followed by the new alliance between Russia and Iran on Syria, and the ongoing coordination between Russia and Israel, of which Kuntar's assassination is an example, makes any Hezbollah retaliation far more complicated.

The third issue is Russia's role in Syria. The Iranian and Hezbollah leaderships know that Russia cannot be trusted: its priority is to save Assad's regime, not to protect Iran's interests. In fact, what Iran wants in Syria differs substantially from what Russia wants, but the support base wasn't aware of these discrepancies. Kuntar's death has exposed the ugly truth about Russia's coordination with Israel and how serious it is when it comes to targeting Hezbollah's commanders and assets. Hezbollah cannot retaliate and now the support base understands this ugly truth. For these supporters, Iran is supposed to stand above all. Iran is not in Syria to make compromises over its authority and control, and it is certainly not supposed to accept an ally coordinating with an enemy.

The assassination of Samir Kuntar revealed two things to the Shiite support base: that Iran is actually weak and is compromising in Syria, and that the region has moved beyond the Israeli/Arab conflict, and Hezbollah now has different priorities. For Hezbollah, the most unsettling part of this military coordination between Russia and Israel is that it allows Israel to fly freely over Syria as long as it coordinates with Russia. Also, Russia knows the logistic and military details of Hezbollah and the Iranian Revolutionary Guards in Syria.

It's extremely worrying to Hezbollah that Russia is sharing these details with Israel under this arrangement. Meanwhile, Iran is not benefiting from the Russian intervention. Rather, it is jeopardizing its plans both on military and diplomatic levels, which will eventually jeopardize its ambitions in the region.

As far as Russia is concerned, Iran, its interests, and its commanders can go to hell. Russia is in Syria for Russia, not for Iran. When Iran and the US signed the deal earlier this year, it was sold to the Shiite support base as a victory. 'We brought the US to the table,' they said. 'We still have our nuclear program,' they stated. 'We will never be America's allies.' It wasn't easy to satisfy everybody, but at least Iran didn't lose in this deal. With the Russian intervention in Syria, however, Iran is actually losing territory, control and future prospects.

It will be extremely hard to sell this one.

John-- The House Interior and Environment spending bill represents the single worst attack we've ever seen on our air, lands, water and wildlife. Please urge your representative to oppose this unprecedented assault on our environment.

-- Gene

Tell Congress to reject the biggest assault ever on our air, water, lands and wildlife.

Friend,

The House Republican leadership has just upped the ante on their already unprecedented assault on our nation's bedrock environmental laws.

Tell Congress to reject the biggest assault ever on our air, water, lands & wildlife.

This week, as part of the Interior and Environment spending bill, House Republican leaders and other pro-polluter lawmakers are pushing a series of amendments that represent the most egregious attack ever on our air, land, water and wildlife.

The spending bill contains more than three dozen anti-environment policy measures that have absolutely no place in a budget measure, won't save the country a penny and are nothing more than giveaways to various special interest polluters.

Click here to e-mail your member of Congress. Tell them to reject this extreme assault on vital environmental safeguards that protect the air our children breathe and the water they drink.

The egregious policy provisions include measures that -- if enacted into law -- would threaten Americans' lives and well-being by blocking limits on harmful air pollution, increase pollution in sources of drinking water for 117 million Americans, cause animal and plant species to become extinct by denying them Endangered Species Act protections, and threaten the iconic Grand Canyon with toxic pollution from uranium mining. And these are just a handful of the dirty and dangerous provisions included in this legislation!

While we recognize that some spending cuts are necessary to reduce our federal deficit, the cuts in this particular legislation would have a devastating impact on Americans' health and environment. Those cuts include budget reductions of 18 percent for the EPA, 80 percent for the Land and Water Conservation Fund and 21 percent for the Fish and Wildlife Service.

Click here to e-mail your member of Congress. Tell them to reject this extreme legislation that is nothing more than a giveaway to Big Oil, Dirty Coal and other corporate polluters.

As if the underlying bill weren't harmful enough, we expect members of Congress to offer anti-environmental amendments on the floor that would wreak even greater havoc on Americans' health and environment and keep us dependent on expensive and dangerous energy sources.

Fortunately, President Obama has threatened to veto this harmful legislation, noting that a number of the measures in the bill are "ideological and political provisions that are beyond the scope of funding legislation." However, we cannot afford to let House Republican leaders push this legislation without a fight. We must expose their extreme anti-environment efforts. Click here to e-mail your representative.

Subject:	FYI, Correct the Record Responds to Rand Paul Media Tour

Washington Post: Rand Paul says he scares Democrats. Should he?

"It's pretty funny to see Rand Paul trying to direct Democrats on policy and politics alike," said Adrienne Elrod, communications director for Correct The Record, a Clinton-aligned super PAC. "He's too cute by half, and as a whole, he is too dangerous for our nation."

Washington Post: Rand Paul says he scares Democrats. Should he?

By Chris Cillizza

August 25 at 2:42 p.m. EDT

Here's Rand Paul on what a 2016 matchup between himself and de facto Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton might look like: "If you wanna see a transformational election in our country, let the Democrats put forward a war hawk like Hillary Clinton, and you'll see a transformation like you've never seen."

While I'm not sure Clinton would describe herself as a "war hawk" she has tended -- as Secretary of State and in the Senate -- to favor more aggressive approaches to international conflicts then those advocated by President Obama or, for that matter, Paul.

Consider:

* Clinton, while in the Senate, voted for the use of force resolution against Iraq in 2002. Obama, spoke out in opposition to it. Paul, who, like Obama, wasn't in the Senate at the time of the vote, has worked to repeal the use of force resolution.

* Clinton supported a larger troop surge in Afghanistan in 2009. Obama chose a smaller one. Paul penned an op-ed -- along with two Democratic Senators -- advocating for a faster withdrawal of troops from Afghanistan than Obama proposed.

* Clinton was a strong voice advocating military intervention in Libya. President Obama eventually sided with her. Paul opposed military intervention.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

* Clinton favored more directly and broadly arming Syrian rebels early in the civil war, a move Obama resisted. Paul opposed arming the rebels.

Given that record, if Clinton and Paul were their party's respective nominees, it seems certain that she would be more hawkish in her approach to nearly every major international conflict than he would be. And that fact alone would be a remarkable turnabout -- given that Republicans have built much of their electoral success over the past three-plus decades around a muscular foreign policy. (It remains to be seen whether Paul's non-interventionist views will be disqualifying for him in the Republican primary fight.)

"It's pretty funny to see Rand Paul trying to direct Democrats on policy and politics alike," said Adrienne Elrod, communications director for Correct The Record, a Clinton-aligned super PAC. "He's too cute by half, and as a whole, he is too dangerous for our nation."

The more intriguing question is whether Paul or Clinton would be closer to where the American public stands on what role the U.S. should play in foreign conflicts.

While there is a natural tendency to assume Clinton's hawkish views would be preferred, there's reason to believe that the cumulative effect of a decade's worth of wars in Afghanistan and Iraq -- wars strong majorities don't believe were worth fighting -- has fundamentally altered how people view the U.S.'s place in the world community.

Take this amazing chart via Wall Street Journal politics editor Aaron Zitner from an April NBC-WSJ poll:

And, the NBC-WSJ poll is far from an outlier. In a January Pew poll, six in ten people said "we should pay less attention to problems overseas and concentrate on problems here at home" while just 35 percent said "it's best for the future of our country to be active in world affairs." A June CBS-New York Times survey showed 58 percent saying that the U.S. should not take a leading role "among all other countries in the world in trying to solve international conflicts" while just 37 percent said America should play a leading role. An August NBC-WSJ poll found that just 35 percent of people were either "very" or "somewhat" satisfied with the U.S.'s role in the world while 62 percent were very or somewhat dissatisfied. Back in late 1995, 52 percent said they were satisfied with the U.S. role while 43 percent said they were not.

Support for the U.S. playing a more narrow role in world affairs tends to run higher among Democrats and independents than it does among Republicans. (See my point above about Paul's challenge in selling his views to Republican primary voters.) Whether the difference between Clinton and Paul on that set of issues would be enough to convince some Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents to vote for him, however, remains to be seen. It's simply too far away to begin predicting what the key issues of the 2016 presidential election will be.

"How things have always been" only holds true until those things change. Remember how America would never elect a black president named Barack Obama? Or how the Senate would never invoke the nuclear option? One day the current prevailing conventional wisdom about what the public wants the U.S. to do -- and be -- internationally may find its way onto that list.

Subject:	[big campaign] John McCain Out of Touch on Energy
Attachments:	John McCain And Yucca.doc

JOHN MCCAIN, LIKE BUSH, OUT OF TOUCH ON ENERGY

Yesterday, McCain stood in front of an oil derrick to promote off-shore drilling despite it offering no short term relief for American families. And today, McCain visits Nevada where he'll once again promote storing nuclear waste in Yucca Mountain. Instead of providing real energy solutions, McCain offers more of the same. See attached research.

Even though McCain does not want nuclear waste in his backyard, yours is fine.

- McCain Not Comfortable With Nuclear Waste Being Transported Through Arizona. In an interview in Las Vegas, Senator McCain advocated for the storage of nuclear waste in Yucca Mountain. When asked "What about the transportation? Would you be comfortable with nuclear waste coming through Arizona, you know, going through Phoenix on its way to Yucca Mountain?" McCain: "No I would not." WATCH THE VIDEO .
- McCain Supports Storing Nuclear waste in Yucca. The Las Vegas Review-Journal reported, "[McCain] says 'I think we have to have a place to store the waste. I think that nuclear power has got to be a vital part of our effort to be independent of foreign oil, and I think it's (Yucca Mountain) a suitable place for storage.' McCain said he had not been convinced that the site isn't safe or that transporting the waste to the site was unduly dangerous." [Las Vegas Review-Journal, 5/7/07]
- McCain Has Been Consistent In His Support For Storing Nuclear Waste Within Yucca Mountain. The Las Vegas Sun reported, "John McCain has been consistent in his support for storing nuclear waste within Yucca Mountain. He has said publicly that tough decisions regarding nuclear waste have to be made and that storing nuclear waste over many different states is a larger national threat than storing all the waste at Yucca Mountain. He supports going forward with building more nuclear power plants and believes storing waste inside Yucca Mountain will streamline that cause." [Las Vegas Sun Voters Guide, Accessed 7/28/08]

On energy issues, McCain and Bush share an agenda aimed at helping Big Oil.

- Like Bush, McCain wants to open up American shores to offshore drilling.
- Oil company profits skyrocket while families get left behind. Oil companies' profits continue to rise as the price of gasoline hovers at $4.00 a gallon. BP noted 28 percent increase in their second quarter net profits, bringing in $
- After McCain adopted Bush's drilling policy, donations from the oil and gas industry flowed to McCain's campaign. According to the Washington Post , McCain received more than $1 million from the oil & gas industry last month – more than three fourths coming after he reversed his position on drilling.
- Like Bush, McCain is surrounded by Big Oil lobbyists. At least 29 top advisers or fundraisers for McCain's campaign have lobbied for Big Oil. They have represented 4 of the 9 oil companies in the 2008 Fortune 200.
- Like Bush, McCain offers billions in tax cuts for Big Oil, but no relief for families. According to the Center for American Progress Action Fund, McCain's tax plan gives nearly $4 billion in tax breaks to the top five American oil companies, but gives families very little. Economists have panned McCain's gas tax holiday, saying it won't help families with gas prices.

Israel Warns of Problems in Iran Deal

Many Iranians rushed onto the streets of Tehran on Tuesday night to celebrate what they see as a great victory - an agreement on the country's nuclear program that would leave Iran a significant portion of its capabilities and remove the sanctions that are choking its economy. 1,500 km away, officials in Jerusalem are warning that the agreement will preserve Iran's nuclear capabilities, while making effective supervision very difficult. An Israeli government official said Tuesday evening that "According to the agreement, Iran can be warned up to 24 days before being visited by inspectors. It's as if police who want to raid a drug lab would give the criminals 24 days warning – it is inconceivable."

Diplomat: US to Circulate UN Res on Iran Agreement

A UN Security Council diplomat says the United States will circulate a draft resolution Wednesday that will authorize the agreement between six major powers and Iran to rein in its nuclear program. The diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the U.S. informed council members Tuesday evening that it would introduce the resolution at the end of closed consultations on Libya scheduled for Wednesday morning. The diplomat says US Ambassador Samantha Power will outline the main points in the agreement to council members.

PM: Relationship with Obama had no Bearing on Deal

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Tuesday evening said it was “absurd” to suggest that his relationship with US President Barack Obama had any bearing on the nuclear deal. In his third statement to the press in a single day, the prime minister said that without Israel’s efforts to thwart Iran’s nuclear ambitions, Tehran would have already broken out to the bomb. Israel will continue to work to prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons, he vowed. Netanyahu made a brief statement after exiting a security cabinet meeting, during which the ministers voted unanimously to reject the Iran deal “and determined that Israel is not bound by it,” according to a press release.

Ynet News

Kerry: Netanyahu 'Way Over the Top' on Iran Deal

US Secretary of State John Kerry lashed out at Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Tuesday night, saying the Israeli leader's claims about the nuclear deal signed with Iran were "way over the top." "This is under attack by people who really don't know the terms of the agreement," Kerry told NBC News. "What the critics of this plan never offer... is a realistic alternative," he said, displaying evident frustration. "It's wrong for people to think this doesn't have long-term accountability." Netanyahu dubbed the agreement a "stunning historic mistake," saying the world was now a "much more dangerous place" as a result. Kerry rejected these comments, saying, Netanyahu "said the same thing about the interim agreement, and he was wrong. The fact is that he's been practically making comments that are way over the top.”

Jerusalem Post

Pro-Israel Groups in US Line Up to Slam Iran Deal

Within hours of the unveiling on Tuesday of a nuclear pact between Iran and six world powers, the loudest pro-Israel voice in Washington was warning the US Congress of problems, marking the onset of what promises to be a furious lobbying campaign. AIPAC said in a statement it was "deeply concerned" that the deal "would fail to block Iran's path to a nuclear weapon and further entrench and empower the leading state sponsor of terror." The considerable clout of pro-Israel interests on Capitol Hill will play an important role in deciding the fate of the pact, hammered out in Vienna. Some of the lobbying will be aimed at Jewish members of Congress, who will be influential voices in the upcoming debate. Besides lobbying, 2016 political campaign contributions to members of the US Congress are expected to be dangled.

Clinton: This Agreement can Make Israel Safer

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton voiced her support of the nuclear pact between Iran and six world powers, unveiled in Vienna on Tuesday, and also vowed to strengthen ties with Israel in view of Jerusalem's concerns over the deal. The deal "can help us prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon," Clinton said in a statement, adding that "with vigorous enforcement, unyielding verification, and swift consequences for any violations, this agreement can make the United States, Israel, and our Arab partners safer." Against the background of severe Israeli criticism of the agreement, Clinton also stressed that "Israel has to be confident that the United States will always ensure its Qualitative Military Edge in the region and its capacity to defend itself by itself."

Ha'aretz

PM and Herzog Meet to Discuss a 'Unified Stance'

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Opposition Leader Isaac Herzog met on Tuesday to discuss the nuclear deal signed between world powers and Iran. In their meeting, the prime minister updated the opposition leader on the briefs given to cabinet ministers regarding the implications of the deal to Israel's security. Netanyahu told Herzog that the agreement between the coalition and the opposition regarding the danger the deal entails for Israel's security is especially important at this time, and added that "on this issue, relating to the most significant national interest, it's important to present the world with a unified stance." Herzog reiterated his statements from earlier on Tuesday, saying that the deal is bad and that he is "enlisting to do everything for the security of the State of Israel in the new situation that has been created."

Iran Deal Puts Military Option Back on Table

The Vienna agreement does delay Iran's construction of a bomb by a year or more, but if Iran chooses to violate the deal, it could get the bomb within a few weeks; Israel must prepare for a potential pre-emptive strike on Iran's nuclear facilities and on Hezbollah.

By Ron Ben Yishai

At the end of the day, the success of the agreement signed on Tuesday in Vienna depends on the goodwill of the Iranian leadership, which is notoriously untrustworthy. Israel should therefore take the necessary precautions and prepare for an Iranian violation of the agreement.

The historic agreement signed in Vienna Tuesday is a diplomatic masterpiece. In its essence, the text doesn't prevent Iran from going nuclear, but does insure that it won't achieve such abilities in the immediate future – that is, not during the tenure of President Barack Obama and the other world leaders involved in the agreement.

Obama faces two difficult months ahead during which time he will need to convince the members of both houses of Congress to approve the agreement, including the lifting of sanctions on Iran. He may have to veto an opposition decision by the Republican majority in the House and find ways to please the many Democrats who do not support the deal.

But the American president will have his way in the end. This will be his greatest legacy in the realm of foreign policy, an agreement that turns the page on US-Iran relations and postpones a nuclear Middle East for a few years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From Israel's point of view, the agreement puts the military option back on the table and increases its urgency. The Israeli government will now have to decide whether or not to attack Iran if and when the ayatollahs decide to make a break for a nuclear weapon.

But Obama can comfortably say, without fear of being disproved, that the Vienna agreement does realistically delay Iran's construction of the bomb by a year or more - just as promised. Obama and the other world powers can also brag that means of inspection agreed upon allow for strict oversight of uranium production and if Iran breaks the rules, they will be able to renew sanctions.

Similarly, it can also be said that before the agreement expires and while sanctions are lifted, Iran will open up to the West and maybe the regime will change its nature and give up its desire to command a nuclear arsenal. Obama repeatedly made concessions, but at least he got something in return

World champions of fraud

On the other hand, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is completely correct in saying that the Vienna agreement doesn't prevent Iran from developing and producing a nuclear weapon. The deal only delays the process, in the best of circumstances for 10 years or more, in the worst of circumstance for one or two years.

The date that will determine everything is the day sanctions on Iran will be lifted in their entirety (in 2016) plus another two years. After a period of time, it probably won't be realistic or possible to consolidate an international consensus to renew the sanctions or for the Americans to act militarily if Iran breaks the rules. Iran's leadership will be free to either stick to the agreement or break it either openly or secretly. Rouhani and the Revolutionary Guards will decide which path to take.

It should be remembered that the Iranians are world champions of fraud. They acquired invaluable experience in the field over the last decade. Until the West deliberates and decides what to do, the ayatollahs will already have the knowledge and quick, modern infrastructure to enrich uranium as well as an ability to produce a minimized war head to be mounted on a rocket. Under these conditions, the road to a nuclear weapon is only a matter of a few months.

Even if the next US presidents remained determined and united with other world powers to limit Iran's nuclear capabilities in 10-15 years' time, they will have a difficult time doing so in practice. Until everyone recognizes that Iran definitely decided to make a break for the weapon, and until they decide what to do, even a US military strike will be too little too late. And that's in the best case scenario that Iran follows the rules they signed off on in the agreement.

Only one year to a bomb

Already today, Iran is a threshold state, capable of enriching uranium to the level required for developing a warhead two-three months down the line. But its military program is not as advanced – nobody in the West is able to say with certainty how long Iran would need to develop an operational nuclear warhead; the estimate is that they would need another few months. So, realistically, Iran is a year away from the bomb.

The agreement's greatest achievement is that it keeps the breakout time at that. In terms of uranium enrichment, it even puts further obstacles, because it requires Iran to dismantle most of the centrifuges in its possession and drastically reduce the reserve of enriched uranium it currently holds (which is sufficient for six-eight bombs). Also, Iran will be prevented altogether from enriching plutonium to levels required for military use.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is Obama's main achievement. No less important, Secretary of State John Kerry conditioned the removal of the sanctions upon the reduction of Iran's enrichment capabilities. In other words, the sanctions will not be fully removed until Tehran proves, upfront, that the conditions were fully met.

But what if Iran violates the deal?

But there remains a huge loophole that beckons the Iranians to cheat. Even though it would be a violation of the agreement, Iran is perfectly able to develop new models of centrifuges that could enrich uranium at a pace that is three to eight times greater than the old ones. Essentially, were Iran to choose not to abide by the deal, it would be able to get the bomb within a few weeks.

But the biggest loophole of all is IAEA's limited ability to monitor and inspect violations of the restrictions on manufacturing the weapons themselves. Even though the inspection clauses are draconian, Iran can engage in foot-dragging that would simply stymie them.

As to ballistics, the Vienna agreement leaves many loose ends. In practice, Iran can continue to develop ballistic missiles, cruise missiles and multiple re-entry missiles that, further down the line, will be able to carry nuclear warheads.

Free to buy and sell weapons

Other clauses that aren't directly connected to Iran's nuclear capability are also hardly encouraging, like its renewed ability to sponsor terror and insurgency across the Middle East. The powers conceded to Iran's demand to alleviate the UN Security Council prohibition on buying and selling conventional weapons. It will be only two years down the line but, eventually, Iran will be able not only to arm Syrian President Bashar Assad, but also to purchase air defense systems to protect their nuclear facilities.

In addition, the removal of the sanctions will bring Iran billions of dollars in revenue as early as 2016 – a sum big enough not only to stabilize its failing economy, keep the Revolutionary Guards at bay and perpetuate the Islamic regime (against the wishes of the West), but also to fund terror and press on with their aspirations for regional hegemony. This is a grave concern not only for Israel, but for Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan, too.

A gentlemen's agreement?

Could a better agreement have been achieved? Possibly. But the problem with the Vienna accord, just like other treaties to curb nuclear proliferation, is that it depends, at the end of the day, on the goodwill of the Iranian leadership and, even more so, on the deterrence power of the West.

The agreement is based on trust. The Western powers believe that if Iran signed the deal it will either abide by it or openly declare it void. That's not the way of the Middle East. It proved ineffectual vis-à-vis North Korea as well. True, the Iranian regime is more sensitive to sanctions, but once they've been removed it will be ten times more difficult to renew them.

Would no deal have been better? It wouldn't have worked either. The sanctions would have remained in place, but Iran would have still been able to accumulate uranium, develop new centrifuges and build warheads, and break out the minute Khamenei had put his mind to it. The agreement, thus, is the lesser of two evils: At the very least, it delays Iran's nuclear armament by a few years – and that, it should be noted, is exactly what Israel wanted to achieve a few years ago by launching a military strike.

Therefore, there's no use crying over spilled milk and pointing fingers. What we need now is a clear operative plan that takes into account the possibility that Iran hasn't given up on trying to get the bomb. That's why we need to keep the pressure on Iran, and opt for a military strike if Iran goes nuclear; and if one day it comes to pass that Iran has a nuclear arsenal, Israel would have to create an effective deterrence and abandon its long-held nuclear ambiguity policy. To this end, Israel will need to do the following:

- Improve the relationships with the Obama administration and other Western governments. Netanyahu's rallying with the Republicans in Congress won't hinder the implementation of the agreement, and will only abet the hostility of the White House. Israel has no time to wait until Obama stands down;
- Reach understandings with the American administration about what counts as violations of the deal, and what sanctions it would entail;
- Beef up intelligence gathering on Iran to minimize the risk of a strategic surprise;
- Improve Israel's defense against missiles, as well as aerial and naval attacks;
- Prepare for a potential pre-emptive strike on Iran's nuclear facilities and on Hezbollah and save it for when it is clear without a shadow of a doubt that Iran is moving towards getting the bomb. Hezbollah will need to be attacked at the same time because it's clear that it will take a proactive role in any conflict between Israel and Iran.

A Deal over Our Heads

By Nahum Barnea

I did not find a single mention of Israel in all 159 pages of the agreement with Iran—not even a hint. On the one hand, this is good: If the world powers were to apply to Israel the same demands that they are posing to the Iranian nuclear project we would be in great trouble; on the other hand, this is outrageous: an agreement that has fateful significance for anyone who lives here was signed over our heads, as if there were nothing between Tehran and Vienna save the good intentions of the ayatollah regime. Israel is nowhere to be found.

The disregard of Israel is not only offensive, it is dangerous. It may pose more dangers to Israel than the Iranian nuclear threshold. In a certain sense it returns us to 1956, when then-US president Eisenhower and the Soviet prime minister, Bulganin, sent threatening letters to the Israeli government and forced it to withdraw from Sinai. Our prime minister was cheered in the US Congress; he was disregarded in the talks in Vienna. The bottom line is that it would have been best had he been cheered less and his country been given more consideration.

The articles of the agreement deal solely with two issues: the nuclear program and sanctions. But their ramifications are much broader. It is no accident that the world media hurried to call the agreement "historic": Far beyond the nuclear issue, it marks a possible shift in the balance of power in the Middle East, in Iran's diplomatic and economic status, perhaps its military status as well, and in its relations with the international community, first and foremost with the United States. The ayatollah regime has received international legitimacy without having undertaken to change its agenda one bit, apart from a freeze of the nuclear project for 10 or 15 years.

US Secretary of State John Kerry, whose life's dream was to formulate an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement that would bring him a Nobel Prize, will receive his Nobel thanks to the agreement with Iran. It is not Netanyahu and Abu Mazen who will stand next to him at the ceremony in the Oslo municipality, but rather Mohammad Javad Zarif, the foreign minister of the ayatollahs. Kerry will accept the change gladly; a Nobel Prize is a Nobel Prize. The agreement with Iran is what Kerry will take home with him when he ends his term. This achievement will be his pride; this achievement will be his disgrace.

After the interim agreement was signed, I wrote that the agreement was the lesser evil; that we should judge it not only by what it has and what it lacks, but also by what might have happened had the agreement not been signed. Scrutiny of the full document reinforces this feeling. It enables Iran to exist as a nuclear threshold state, a year's distance from a bomb. But the alternative—a bellicose Iran, armed with nuclear bombs, free of supervision—is more disheartening.

Netanyahu would prefer an American military operation that would destroy the nuclear facilities along with large parts of Iran. The Americans had no intention of doing this. When President Obama said that all options were on the table, he was bluffing, just as Netanyahu was bluffing when he threatened an Israeli military strike. Netanyahu and Barak invested billions in military preparations that were designed to convince the world that Israel intended to act. For a certain period the bluff worked; it made a contribution to intensifying the sanctions. The problem is that the sanctions did not work—they caused great damage to the Iranian economy, but did not stop the nuclear project.

In the absence of a military operation, Netanyahu would prefer the continuation of the sanctions. In the past few weeks, the aspiration to have the sanctions continue became a matter no less important than the battle against the nuclear program. When the sanctions are removed, Netanyahu says, Iran will be flooded with money; the money will flow to Hizbullah and Hamas, and will be translated into terrorism against Israel.

His battle against the agreement was based on a gamble—that despite the continuation of the sanctions, Iran would be wary of producing a nuclear weapon. It would remain on the threshold. It is with this gamble that he is now going to the US Senate. But the Iranians are now the smaller part of his gamble. The pot has grown; the odds have become worse.

In the coming two months the Senate will be the arena of a violent struggle between Netanyahu and the Obama administration. Based on the initial reactions to the agreement, all the Republican senators will vote against it. Obama will cast a veto. To break the veto, Netanyahu needs 13 Democratic senators. He will get some of them—mainly those who depend on Jewish voters and Jewish funding. His chances of reaching 13 are not high.

The chances are not high because in his confrontational speech in Congress and in all his statements, he pushed the Democrats into Obama's arms; they are not high because US public opinion likes historic agreements, and likes even better agreements that diminish the chance of another war in the Middle East. They have not broken free of Iraq and Afghanistan yet. They have no interest in another front; the chances are not high because all the Democratic candidates for presidency, headed by Hillary Clinton, support the agreement; and the chances are not high because Obama is enjoying a good period, perhaps the best period in all the years of his presidency. Suddenly things are falling in place for him. It is difficult to defeat a president in such a situation.

The price of the battle against Obama is troubling: It pertains to the compensation package that the security establishment justifiably expects to receive from the United States. Doesn't this battle relieve the White House of the obligation to compensate Israel? Netanyahu tells his ministers that he is not impressed by the compensation. This is empty talk. Security officials think otherwise.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Isn't Israel pushing Obama to settle the score with it on another front, the Palestinian front? If Obama comes out with his own plan, or instructs [US diplomats] to stop protecting Israel in international organizations, the diplomatic price, perhaps the economic and morale price, will be high. And the main thing is, with the services that Israel provides the Republican billionaires, it is weakening the Jewish lobby and losing the support of most of the Jews. It is selling its birthright for a mess of pottage.

Netanyahu is behaving like a person who is convinced that this is a battle over Israel's very existence. He is wrong: Israel will exist. The Holocaust is not on our doorstep.

The fact that Israel did not succeed in thwarting the agreement and did not even succeed in influencing its content is a stinging failure. But Netanyahu is failure-proof: in his world there are only two possibilities—either he is a winner, or he is a victim. In the elections, he won; in the agreement with Iran, he is a victim. Instead of giving the Israelis a sober accounting about what happened, he informs them that the Holocaust is on the way. What will the Israelis do with the doses of scare tactics that he is administering to them? Ehud Barak came last night to the television studio to infuse a bit of sanity into the Israelis, a bit of sobriety. This was like a refreshing breeze on a humid day.

Clinton Unveils Far-Reaching Climate Change Plan // NYT // Trip Gabriel and Coral Denport - July 26, 2015

Promising more than a half-billion solar panels by the end of a first term and an ambitious target of clean energy for every home in America in a decade, Hillary Rodham Clinton unveiled goals on Sunday evening to reduce the threat of climate change.

She said she would continue President Obama's sweeping plan to limit carbon emissions from power plants, and announced targets that even push beyond current goal's for greenhouse gases.

Mr. Obama's proposed regulations are expected to be finalized by the Environmental Protection Agency in August, and the real work of making the changes — shutting down coal plans and increasing the number of renewable electricity sources — would fall to the next administration.

The Clinton campaign said the goals, set out on its website in a video, were the first of a six-plank plan to address climate change that Mrs. Clinton would continue to unveil in coming weeks and months.

Other areas of focus will be improving the efficiency of buildings, ensuring that fossil fuel production is "safe and responsible," and protecting financial markets from climate-related risks.

In the video and at an earlier event, Mrs. Clinton said that critics of taking strong action, who include most of the Republican presidential candidates, were ignoring the seriousness of the threat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Those people on the other side, they will answer any question about climate change by saying, ‘I’m not a scientist,’” Mrs. Clinton said in Ames, Iowa on Sunday. “Well I’m not a scientist either. I’m just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain.”

Mrs. Clinton also promised to help any workers who lose their jobs as coal plants respond to Mr. Obama’s plan to limit carbon emissions. Appalachia, once a bastion of Democratic support, has been hostile to Mr. Obama for what officials like Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican majority leader, call a “war on coal.”

“I will be very clear, I want to do more to help in coal country,” Mrs. Clinton said at the event. She expressed gratitude to men “who mined the coal that created industrial revolution that turned on the lights that fueled the factories, who lost their lives, who were grievously injured, who developed black lung disease.”

Mrs. Clinton’s pledge to produce “enough renewable energy to power every American home within 10 years of taking office” — that is, by 2027 — is even more ambitious than Mr. Obama’s plan.

The president has pledged to get the United States to produce 20 percent of electricity from renewable sources by 2030 — essentially tripling renewable power from today.

Mrs. Clinton’s plan would arrive at 33 percent, said Heather Zichal, who served as Mr. Obama’s senior climate change adviser until last year.

“I think this initial statement from her is a strong signal that she’s committed to a thoughtful policy that pushes the envelope,” she said.

Mrs. Clinton’s rollout of a climate plan, the latest in a series of policy agendas, was in part intended to counter the threat on her left from Bernie Sanders, the Vermont senator who draws thunderous cheers at rallies when he calls for the immediate action on the warming climate. And unlike Mr. Sanders, Mrs. Clinton has not clearly stated whether she opposes building the Keystone XL pipeline, which has become the leading rallying cry of grass-roots environmentalists.

On Friday, Tom Steyer, the billionaire climate activist, said that in order to receive his backing and financial support, a candidate would have to pledge to enact an energy policy that would lead to the generation of half the nation’s electricity from renewable or zero-carbon sources by 2030, and 100 percent by 2050.

Martin O’Malley, the former governor of Maryland who is also seeking the Democratic nomination, has already put forth such a plan.

In a statment, Mr. Steyer praised Mrs. Clinton’s proposal without offering explicit financial support. “Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis and ensuring our country’s economic security,” he said.

Hillary Clinton lays out climate change initiative // WaPo // Vanessa Williams - July 26, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton called for harnessing the power of the sun to generate enough renewable energy to run every home in the country within the next decade, as part of a climate change initiative announced Sunday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Future generations will look back and wonder, 'What were we thinking? How could we possibly be so irresponsible?' " the Democratic presidential candidate says in a video that accompanied the plan, which was posted on her Web site Sunday night.

"I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain and I know what's happening in the world will affect my daughter and especially my granddaughter," she said.

In addition to touting her plan, which would include installing more than half a billion solar panels nationwide during the first term of her presidency, Clinton criticized the Republican presidential candidates, who generally dismiss the notion of climate change.

"It's hard to believe that people running for president refuse to believe the settled science of climate change," she says in the video as quotes attributed to GOP hopefuls fill the screen. One such quote, attributed to former Florida governor Jeb Bush, reads: "I'm a skeptic. I'm not a scientist."

Earlier Sunday, while campaigning in Iowa, she used the "grandmother with two eyes and a brain" quip, receiving chuckles and applause. She praised Iowa's efforts to embrace renewable energy, noting that the state produces 30 percent of its energy from wind. Windmills are a common sight on the horizon across the state.

A fact sheet on the plan presented on her Web site said that Clinton will fight efforts to roll back the Clean Power Plan. And she proposes a Clean Power Challenge, including competitions for grants for renewal energy products, as well as more assistance to states and cities and more choices for consumers.

Clinton is scheduled to discuss the plan during a speech Monday in Des Moines.

Clinton talks climate change in Iowa — but still won't talk Keystone // WaPo // Vanessa Williams – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton said Monday that if she's elected president, she could use executive orders and work through federal agencies if Congress tried to block her proposals to combat climate change. But she still wouldn't say where she stood on the Keystone XL project that's drawn the ire of environmentalists.

Speaking at the Des Moines Area Regional Transit Authority's Central Station, which is partly powered by renewable energy sources, the Democratic presidential candidate said climate change would be a major issue in her campaign going forward.

"I refuse to turn my back on what is one of the greatest threats and greatest opportunities America faces," Clinton said. "I refuse to let those who are deniers, who disagree with what we need to do to rip away all the progress that we've made and leave our country exposed to the most severe consequences of climate change."

Although her plan was praised by some activists, including clean energy evangelist Tom Steyer, others have said it doesn't go far enough. Clinton, who has faced criticism for her continued silence on Keystone, on Monday again cited her involvement in the evaluating the project when she was secretary of state, noting that the final decision has yet to be made by her successor, John Kerry. "I will refrain from commenting because I had a leading role in getting that process started and we have to let it run its course," she said.

Clinton's remarks followed a social media rollout of her plans to combat climate change, which call for the installation of more than 500 million solar panels across the country within her first term and powering every home in the United States with renewable energy within 10 years.

In a video presentation of her plan, Clinton took swipes at several Republican presidential candidates, displaying some of their past comments questioning whether climate change is real. One attributed to Jeb Bush read: "I'm a skeptic. I'm not a scientist." Another, attributed to Rand Paul: "It's absolutely and utterly untrue."

Beyond resistance from Republican members of Congress, Clinton said, "our big problem will be the corporate interests that are promoting fossil fuels and still have too much of a grip on our political process and too many advantages in our tax code. I'm well aware I'm going up against powerful interests but there are a number of ways to get to where we need to go."

Clinton said she would make the case that renewable energy is not only good for the environment, but also for the economy because it would create "millions of new jobs and new businesses." She made a point of giving a nod to workers in the fossil fuels industry.

"Even as we face the threat of climate change head on we cannot close our eyes to the challenges facing hard working families in coal country, who kept our lights on and our factories running for more than a century," she said. "We should guarantee that coal miners and their families get the benefits they've earned and the respect they deserve."

Two reasons why Hillary Clinton's first climate change proposal is much more modest than it sounds // WaPo / / Philip Bump – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton announced the first "pillar" of her energy and climate agenda on Sunday, outlining a proposal to increase the number of solar panels to 500 million by the end of her first term -- and to have enough renewable power generation to provide electricity to every home in America by 2027.

The proposals, particularly the latter, are striking. The main challenge of climate change is that the world (and the United States morseo than many places) is dependent on burning fossil fuels for electricity. Burning those fuels releases carbon dioxide into the atmosphere, which traps heat. So moving the country to renewable energy sources, like wind and solar, can reduce the amount of greenhouse gases emitted and therefore stop exacerbating the problem.

So why is this not as impressive a proposal as it might at first seem?

1. Residential electricity usage is only part of the problem.

Data from the Energy Information Administration suggests that residences consume less than half of the electricity sold in the country. Clinton's proposal doesn't suggest that every house will use renewable power; just that the capacity exists.

So a lot of electricity will still be generated the old-fashioned way. And while the fracking boom has helped increase the amount of natural gas that's used in production -- better once burned than coal, but potentially problematic when extracted -- we still rely heavily on coal for our power.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2. Hitting that solar growth target is hard -- but not as hard as you might think.

Here's how much solar energy the residential sector has added over the past few years, thanks to improvements in generation, decreases in panel pricing, and a robust private sector push for installation.

That's helped boost the amount of renewable electricity used in the residential sector overall.

Can we increase solar usage 700 percent? Vox's Brad Plumer figures that the spike in solar usage puts the figure "within the realm of possibility." Solar has the benefit of being scalable on an individual level, which means that some organizing can help. And studies have found that solar power adoption is contagious.

But despite the recent growth, as the chart above shows, solar is still a tiny part of the overall energy mix. In recent years, far larger growth in renewable power generation has been in wind.

The new proposal is only the first pillar, we'll note, so we'll set aside the fact that this doesn't address other large sources of greenhouse gas emissions, like gasoline and diesel fuels.

For those eager to hail Clinton as a champion of the environment, a third note of caution from a press conference today. On one of the top issues for environmental activists, Clinton doesn't have any proposals at all.

Hillary Clinton Sidesteps Keystone in Climate Plan Rollout // WSJ // Colleen McCain Nelson – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton pledged to make combating climate change a central focus of the 2016 presidential campaign, saying Monday that she would not allow “deniers” to thwart progress or prevent the U.S. from leading on the issue.

While Mrs. Clinton cast herself as a crusader for clean energy, she declined to weigh in on a key environmental debate, taking no position on whether to build the Keystone XL pipeline. At an event in Iowa touting her climate plan, Mrs. Clinton said that as secretary of state, she set in motion the review evaluating the pipeline and now would allow her successor, John Kerry, and President Barack Obama to make the final decision.

Donald Trump Tops GOP Field in New Hampshire, Second in Iowa: Poll

“I will refrain from commenting because I had a leading role in getting that process started,” Mrs. Clinton said. “And I think that we have to let it run its course.”

Many Republicans have expressed skepticism about the science of climate change, with some questioning whether it’s real and others doubting that human activity plays a role in global warming — or could play a role in reversing it.

The Keystone XL pipeline, which would move oil from Canada’s oil sands to refineries along the U.S. Gulf Coast, has emerged as a touchstone issue for environmentalists, as well as the energy industry.

Democratic presidential candidates Martin O’Malley and Bernie Sanders have been vocal opponents of the project. Mrs. Clinton said her Democratic rivals never served as secretary of state and added that she is confident Keystone’s impact on greenhouse gas emissions would be a major factor in the administration’s determination of whether to build the pipeline.

Lis Smith, Mr. O'Malley's deputy campaign manager, said Monday: "Every Democrat should follow [Mr. O'Malley's] lead and take a stand to commit to ending our reliance on fossil fuels."

Mrs. Clinton said she's committed to making the U.S. a "clean-energy superpower" and that on day one of her presidency, she would begin work on two key goals: installing more than half a billion solar panels by the end of her first term and generating enough renewable energy to power every home in the country within a decade. Mr. Obama put the county on a path to a clean-energy future, she said, but more needs to be done.

"The reality of climate change is unforgiving no matter what the deniers say," Mrs. Clinton said. "This is one of the most urgent threats of our time, and we have no choice but to rise and meet it."

The Republican National Committee on Monday deemed Mrs. Clinton's climate policy vague and costly.

"Hillary Clinton's energy 'plan' is to raise more taxes and double down on President Obama's EPA overreach, which held down wages and cost American jobs," RNC spokesman Michael Short said. "Clinton avoided specifics and refused to take a position on important job-creating energy projects like the Keystone Pipeline, reminding voters why they think she's untrustworthy."

Mrs. Clinton did not detail how, exactly, she would pay for her clean-energy proposals. She said she would offer more specifics in the future and that some of these initiatives would pay for themselves.

Mr. Obama has faced strong resistance in Congress to his climate agenda and largely has relied on executive actions to rein in carbon emissions. Mrs. Clinton said she may pursue a similar strategy but added that addressing climate change should be a nonpartisan issue.

"We still have a lot that we can do without getting congressional support," Mrs. Clinton said. "However, it is in everybody's interest. This is not a Republican or Democratic problem."

Hillary Clinton Previews Plans to Combat Climate Change // WSJ // Colleen McCain Nelson - July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Sunday offered a preview of her plans to combat climate change, pledging to set high goals and build a clean-energy economy.

At an organizing event in Iowa, Mrs. Clinton swiped at Republicans who question the threat posed by climate change and said she was serious about addressing the issue.

"Those people on the other side, they will answer any question about climate change by saying I'm not a scientist," she said. "I'm not a scientist either—I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain…I know that if we start addressing it, we're going to actually be creating jobs and new businesses."

The Clinton campaign is expected to release more details about her climate policy Sunday evening, and she will deliver a speech about her plan Monday morning in Des Moines.

Mrs. Clinton has previously characterized climate change as an urgent threat and has voiced support for President Barack Obama's executive actions to limit carbon pollution.

She has stayed silent, though, on the question of whether the Keystone XL pipeline should be built, declining to weigh in on what has been a contentious yearslong debate. Mrs. Clinton oversaw the Obama administration's review of the project during her tenure as secretary of state.

She made no mention of Keystone on Sunday but called for an emphasis on generating more wind and solar energy. Mrs. Clinton called for a rebalancing of tax incentives, which she said are too heavily weighted toward fossil fuels.

"Our politics are imprisoned by the past," she said.

Democratic presidential candidates Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders have been unequivocal in their opposition to Keystone and have made climate policy a central component of their campaigns.

Mr. O'Malley has laid out an aggressive plan for combating climate change, calling for the U.S. to transition to 100% clean energy by 2050. Mr. O'Malley, the former governor of Maryland, has called for federal legislation capping carbon emissions and has pledged to reject the Keystone XL pipeline and deny new permits for drilling in Alaska and Antarctica.

Mr. Sanders, an independent senator from Vermont who is running in the Democratic primary, has been a vocal opponent of the pipeline, which has been under review by the Obama administration for more than six years. He has urged "bold action" and has said the U.S. needs to accelerate technological progress to generate more solar and wind energy.

Mrs. Clinton's rollout of a plan to address climate change comes on the heels of billionaire climate-change activist Tom Steyer calling for 2016 candidates to develop concrete plans to increase the share of clean energy in the U.S.'s power generation mix to 50% by 2030.

Mr. Steyer, who spent $73 million during the 2014 midterm elections, has set a high bar for winning his support in 2016. A spokesperson for his advocacy group, NextGen Climate, on Friday said candidates who don't embrace Mr. Steyer's goal aren't likely to be backed by the organization.

In Iowa, Clinton says climate plan will promote renewables // AP // Thomas Beaumont - July 26, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton unveiled Sunday a plan aimed at combating climate change that includes proposed revisions in the tax code to promote renewable energy and goals for renewable sources for consumer electricity.

In Iowa, the nation's second-leading wind energy producer, Clinton said people are "just not paying attention" if they don't acknowledge climate change.

"This is not complicated folks," the former secretary of state told more than 200 people at Iowa State University. "I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain. And I know we're facing huge problem."

Climate change has become a key issue in the Democratic presidential primary, where Clinton is the heavy favorite.

Billionaire Tom Steyer has led an effort to promote the issue. The California-based Steyer hosted a fundraiser for Clinton in May.

Clinton proposes, through tax incentives, to increase the amount of power derived from renewable sources to support every home in the United States within 10 years.

For instance, Clinton said she supports renewing the wind energy tax credit as part of over time shifting the U.S. energy system from one based on fossil fuels.

"We need to get the incentives fixed in our tax system which as you know are too heavily weighted toward fossil fuels," Clinton said during a day of campaigning in central Iowa.

Clinton also hinted that her plans would impose changes on the coal industry, though she also pledged the government's help for workers to make the transition.

"We can make a transition over time from a fossil fuel economy, predominantly, to a clean renewable energy economy, predominantly," Clinton said later during an event at a central Iowa rural home.

Weaning the country off of coal is a tricky political position in key places on the political battleground map. Southeast Ohio and western Pennsylvania are regions of states that have been pivotal in recent elections. And they remain the home of key coal-producing areas.

Crediting coal-miners for having "created an industrial revolution," Clinton said "it is important that we help them transition to a new economy."

Clinton's plan also includes the goal of installing 500 million solar panels within four years.

It would also increase capacity to the nation's power grid with a combination of renewable energy sources such as wind, solar, hydroelectric and geothermal.

Clinton did not include a price tag for the plan or describe how it would be financed.

Clinton was scheduled to discuss the plan in detail during a public event in Des Moines Monday morning.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, also seeking the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, noted Sunday that he unveiled a climate change plan in Iowa that addresses not just consumer energy use, but industrial and transportation, as well.

As governor, O'Malley doubled Maryland's renewable fuel production, and reduced greenhouse gases in the state by 10 percent during his two terms.

Clinton offers energy plans, declines comment on pipeline // AP // Catherine Lucey – July 27, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton is detailing new energy proposals in Iowa to address climate change. She calls global warming one of the "most urgent threats of our time."

But she's still not taking a position on the Keystone XL oil pipeline.

The Democratic presidential contender is proposing that every home in the United States be powered by renewable sources by 2027. Her plan calls for installation of 500 million solar panels over four years.

Clinton laid out clean-energy ideas during a tour of a regional bus station in Des Moines, Iowa, on Monday.

When asked about the Keystone XL oil pipeline opposed by environmental activists, she would not comment except to say she wants a State Department review of the project to run its course.

Hillary Clinton steers clear of Keystone // Politico // Hadas Gold – July 27, 2015

Despite rolling out a set of climate change goals Sunday night, Hillary Clinton declined once again to take a position on the proposed Keystone XL pipeline on Monday, deferring to the State Department.

After touring a green-certified transit station in Des Moines, Clinton told reporters that she wouldn't comment on the pipeline because she had played a leading role in starting the process to review the project while she was secretary of state.

"No other presidential candidate was secretary of state when this process started, and I put together a very thorough deliberative evidence-based process to evaluate the environmental impact and other considerations of Keystone," Clinton said.

"As such, I know there is a very careful evaluation continuing and that the final decision is pending to be made by Secretary Kerry and President Obama. Very simply, the evaluation determines whether this pipeline is in our nation's interest and I'm confident that the pipeline impacts on global greenhouse gas emissions will be a major factor in that decisions, as the president has said. So I will refrain from commenting because I had a leading role in getting that process started and I think we have to let it run its course," she said.

On Sunday evening, Clinton rolled out the first elements of her climate change platform, calling for moving the economy on "a path towards deep decarbonization by 2050" and "enough clean renewable energy to power every home in America" by 2027.

On Monday, Clinton said she will soon lay out a plan for how to pay for her goals but that she intends to be a "good fiscal steward" for investments that will pay off in the future.

"A lot of these changes will pay for themselves. So there will be front-end money needed," Clinton said. "But there are ways of making those investments and getting a return on those investments that will redound to the benefits of the American taxpayer. So I will be talking about energy and climate security, modernizing North American infrastructure, about safe and responsible production, especially making sure tax payers get a fair deal for development on public lands and areas that I think are too sensitive for production that should be taken off the table."

Clinton also said she would stop the "giveaways to big oil companies" and extend tax incentives to clean energy.

As for convincing a possible Republican-controlled Congress to join on the climate change bandwagon, Clinton said she hopes to be able to call for a "ceasefire" on climate change.

"Making this a central issue in my campaign, I hope, will give me the momentum to be able to go to the congress and say, 'Look, cease fire.' We need to make the transition and we can do it and save money at the same time and create millions of new jobs and businesses that will be to the benefit of our country, so stay tuned," Clinton said.

The holes in Hillary Clinton's climate plan // Politico // Elana Schor – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton's newly unveiled climate vision sounds ambitious on its face: 500 million new solar panels from coast to coast, eco-minded energy tax breaks and enough green power to keep the lights on in every U.S. home.

But just as glaring were the details she left out.

Does Clinton support or oppose the Keystone XL oil pipeline? Or Arctic offshore drilling? Or tougher restrictions on fracking? Or the oil industry's push to lift the 1970s ban on exporting U.S. crude oil? Clinton avoided all those questions in the solar-heavy climate plan she outlined Sunday night, and in her speech promoting it Monday in Iowa — and she declined yet again Monday to say where she stands on Keystone.

That means that liberals longing for Clinton to erase what they see as the dirtiest spot on President Barack Obama's environmental record — his support for an "all-of-the-above" energy strategy that includes domestic oil and gas drilling — have to keep waiting. Greens want to cheer for Clinton, but Democratic rivals Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley are already trying to outflank her with even more ambitious climate plans, while the GOP attacks her from the right.

"Clinton's climate plan is remarkable for what it doesn't say, yet," California-based environmental activist R.L. Miller, who founded the Climate Hawks Vote PAC, said in a statement. Specifically, she added, Clinton offered "no effort to keep fossil fuels in the ground, no price on carbon; no word on Keystone XL, Arctic oil or other carbon bombs; no word on fracking."

Climate activists are also looking for the Democratic front-runner to put some distance between herself and her record at the State Department, which issued a series of studies finding no significant environmental obstacles to approving Keystone.

"We're expecting a reset" of the former secretary's platform, Sierra Club Executive Director Michael Brune said in an interview, "and a completely different climate and energy policy than the last time she ran for president."

While Clinton's pitch to boost renewables to a 33-percent share of the nation's power supply is "a positive first step," Brune added, "we're looking for her to reconcile her climate and energy policies, which is something Obama has not yet been able to do effectively."

Even a largely glowing response from billionaire climate activist Tom Steyer made a point of noting that "in the coming months we look forward to hearing more details about her proposals."

At the core of the tension is climate activists' insistence that the next president go beyond defending Obama's main approach to global warming — a series of EPA regulations that will throttle carbon emissions from major pollution sources such as power plants. Instead, they want Obama's successor to commit to reining in an oil and gas industry that has turned the U.S. into one of the world's top fuel exporters.

Anti-fossil fuel campaign group Oil Change International's campaigns director, David Turnbull, warned that greens are looking for a candidate with a plan to keep oil and gas locked up, not just expand wind and solar projects.

"Any coherent climate policy needs to address not just our urgent need to continue scaling up renewable energy but also the reality that fossil fuel production needs to be swiftly curtailed as well," he said.

Clinton's campaign described Monday's speech as "just the beginning" of a broader energy plan, promising future proposals to cut U.S. oil use — without mention of natural gas consumption — and ensure "safe and responsible" drilling by putting some lands off-limits. But the former first lady has already declined to endorse a ban on fossil-fuel development on public lands, which O'Malley has backed, and she hewed to a years-long pattern in declining to take a position on Keystone.

O'Malley's deputy campaign manager, Lis Smith, slammed Clinton again Monday for avoiding Keystone, and for failing to publicly oppose drilling off the Alaska coast.

"Real leadership is about forging public opinion on issues like Keystone — not following it," Smith said in a statement that touted O'Malley's goal of 100-percent clean power by 2050. "Every Democrat should follow his lead and take a stand to commit to ending our reliance on fossil fuels."

Republican National Committee spokesman Michael Short also hit Clinton over her Keystone silence, but the GOP took the criticism a step further by trashing her renewable-power plan as lacking detail yet loaded with inevitable tax hikes. "Hillary Clinton's energy 'plan' is to raise more taxes and double down on President Obama's EPA overreach," Short said in a statement.

The Clinton camp estimates that its proposal, which calls for installing 500 million solar panels across the U.S. by the end of her term, would cost about $60 billion over 10 years — money that would come from rolling back tax benefits for the oil and gas industry. But it's unclear where at least $20 billion of that money would come from.

Democrats have unsuccessfully targeted an array of oil and gas breaks for repeal over the past four years, with estimates of the money raised in the process going as high as $4 billion per year, or $40 billion over 10 years, leaving Clinton short by one-third at best. A failed 2012 Democratic bill ending oil and gas subsidies would have raised $24 billion over 10 years, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

The Clinton campaign did not return a request for comment on how it would close the gap in paying for its renewable-energy plan, and on its future oil and gas agenda.

Still, environmentalists welcomed Clinton's announcement as a promising start.

Heather Taylor-Miesle, director of the Natural Resources Defense Council Action Fund, said her group is "excited about" the opening bid from Clinton, while acknowledging that "we have to deal with oil and gas" and that environmentalists won't know how to judge the candidate's plan in that department until she reveals it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even 350.org co-founder Bill McKibben, who aimed a torrent of anti-Keystone activism at Clinton's State Department and warned her in June that "many serious environmentalists currently distrust you," said her first crack at a climate plan got "half the way there."

"Now, we need Clinton to show she understands the other half of the climate change equation — and prove she has the courage to stand up against fossil fuel projects like offshore and Arctic drilling, coal leasing in [Wyoming's] Powder River basin and the Keystone XL pipeline," he added in a statement.

After Clinton said Monday that she couldn't speak on Keystone "because I had a leading role in" the pipeline's administration review, McKibben said by email that her rationale was "silly" because "she's rightly full of insights about Iran, about Benghazi, about Korea, about a thousand other ongoing issues the State [Department] processes daily."

Hillary Clinton rolls out climate agenda // Politico // Darren Goode and Hadas Gold - July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton unveiled her most detailed proposals on climate change since becoming a presidential candidate, calling for moving the economy on "a path towards deep decarbonization by 2050" and "enough clean renewable energy to power every home in America" by 2027.

Progressives have been badgering Clinton to take a strong stance on climate change. Earlier this month in New Hampshire a group of activists disrupted her first town hall in the state, demanding she pledge to end extraction of fossil fuels on public lands.

The plan is the most specific that Clinton's made yet as a candidate on how she would combat climate change, she and though she has often been outflanked on the left by her Democratic challengers, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley.

But on Sunday evening she won praise from billionaire climate-change activist Tom Steyer, who last week called on presidential candidates to embrace a goal of generating 50 percent of the nation's power from carbon-free sources by 2030 with an eye toward "a completely clean energy economy" by 2050.

Clinton spokesperson Brian Fallon said that the plan Clinton laid out is the equivalent of 33 percent of power coming from green energy sources like solar, wind and geothermal by 2027, which when coupled with nuclear power, exceeds Steyer's 2030 goal.

In a statement after Clinton's plan emerged, Steyer said the Democratic front runner had "emerged as a strong leader" in addressing climate change.

"Clinton laid out an ambitious framework to put our nation on a path to a clean energy economy that will create millions of jobs—and in the coming months we look forward to hearing more details about her proposals to tackle climate change," he said.

Clinton's plan calls for having 500 million solar panels installed by the end her term if she's elected president. That would be part of the effort to hike solar capacity to 140 gigawatts by the end of 2020, the equivalent of about 140 nuclear reactors and an increase of 700 percent from current levels.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She also wants to add more power generation from other renewable sources, like wind and geothermal.

Clinton called for extending federal clean energy tax incentives, and she pledged to defend the Obama Clean Power Plan, which would cut greenhouse gases from power plants. She also would launch a "Clean Energy Challenge" that would award competitive grants and other incentives for states.

Her campaign will roll out out a more detailed energy and climate strategy in the coming months that will call for reducing oil consumption, modernize the nation's energy infrastructure, improve building efficiency and "protect the health and retirement security" of coal miners.

In a speech on Sunday in a ballroom at the Iowa State University alumni center, Clinton was bullish on her climate change goals.

"I am setting some really high goals that we are going to meet when I am president," Clinton said, noting that just as many people work in the solar power sector as do in the coal industry.

"Those people on the other side, they will answer any question about climate change by saying 'I'm not a scientist,'" she continued. "I'm not a scientist either. I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain."

Clinton also unveiled a new video on Sunday hitting Republicans for denying climate change.

"Future generations will look back and say 'what were we thinking? How could we be so irresponsible,'" Clinton says in the video.

In one clip, quotes from Republican candidates such as Jeb Bush, Rand Paul, Ted Cruz, Marco Rubio and Donald Trump denying climate change appear on the screen as Clinton says "It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change."

On Monday, Clinton will speak about her climate change plan at a Des Moines Area Regional Transit Authority station.

Two of Clinton's primary challengers, O'Malley and Sanders, have sought to outflank her on the left on climate change.

Sanders has noted his views on climate and staunch opposition to building of the Keystone XL oil pipeline as two areas his record is distinguishable from Clinton's.

O'Malley's campaign released a preemptive strike via email Sunday afternoon, touting his signing into law as governor a statewide target of reducing total greenhouse gas emissions by 25 percent by 2020.

O'Malley, who is running a distant third in the Democratic race, is also pushing for electricity to be solely derived from renewable sources by 2050. That's the exact same pledge Steyer is seeking from 2016 presidential candidates, but Steyer has also already held a fundraiser for Clinton at his San Francisco home.

Hillary Clinton Vows to Defend, Extend Obama Climate Policy // Bloomberg // Mark Drajem - July 26, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton said she would both defend and go beyond the efforts by President Barack Obama to address climate change in the first detailed description of her potential environmental polices if elected president.

Clinton released what her campaign said was the opening salvo of the Democrat's energy and climate change agenda Sunday, while she was campaigning in Iowa.

Among other things, Clinton pledged to defend from legal or political attack the Obama administration's rule to cut carbon pollution from the nation's fleet of power plants.

A Clinton administration would go further, rewarding communities that speed rooftop solar panel installation, backing a contest for states to go beyond the minimums called for in the environmental rules, and boosting solar and wind production on federal lands.

A four-page campaign fact sheet said the goal was to increase the share of U.S. power generation from renewable sources to 33 percent by 2027, compared to 25 percent under Obama's carbon plan.

The announcement "makes it more clear than ever that she cares deeply about climate change and will make it a top priority throughout her campaign," Tiernan Sittenfeld, senior vice president of the League of Conservation Voters Action Fund, said in a statement.

State Mandates

The majority of U.S. states had already established their own renewable power goals by 2012, according to the federal Energy Information Administration.

California has a goal of buying 33 percent of its power from renewable energy resources by 2020. The state describes this renewables portfolio standard on its website as "one of the most ambitious" in the country.

The early announcement of Clinton's climate plan contrasts with the last presidential election cycle, in which neither major-party nominee highlighted the issue. Environmental advocates started a social media effort to try to get both campaigns to at least talk about the the climate.

Since winning re-election, Obama has made fighting climate a top priority and introduced a series of measures. He said this month that getting a global deal on cutting greenhouse-gas emissions is the remaining top priority of his tenure.

The mix of policies laid out by Clinton include a pledge to produce enough renewable energy in a decade to power every U.S. home, and to curb gasoline demand, neither an easy task. U.S. gasoline usage is up this year, as lower prices boost driving. The campaign's plans don't include any actions aimed specifically at helping oil, natural gas or coal producers.

Clinton said she would help coal-dependent communities, such as those in West Virginia or eastern Kentucky, cope with the transition away from the carbon-heavy fuel. Obama had made a similar pledge in his most recent budget.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton on Sunday set two "bold national goals" to combat climate change, promising that if she's elected president, she would set the United States on a path toward producing enough clean renewable to power every home in America within a decade.

She would also initiate a process that would bring the total number of solar panels installed nationwide to more than half a billion before the end of her first term, her campaign said in a fact sheet released Sunday as it also posted a video in which Clinton lays out her ambitions.

"We cannot wait any longer" to act on climate change, the Democratic front-runner says in the video. "It's time we stand for a healthier climate, stand for cleaner air, for science, for innovation, for our children, for reality, for the future."

Sunday's announcement and an accompanying speech set for Monday at the LEED Platinum-certified Des Moines Area Regional Transit Central Station are intended as a first step in framing Clinton's views on climate and energy issues. More details about her specific positions and policy areas not discussed will be unveiled in the coming months, the campaign said.

Clinton's unveiling of her big-picture views on renewable energy while visiting Iowa is no accident. The state produces nearly a quarter of the nation's ethanol and is building a growing number of wind farms. Twenty-eight percent of Iowa's power comes from wind, and the state trails only Texas in wind power production. The dominance of renewable energy industries in the state makes it a key political issue, one on which Clinton believes her views align not only with Democrats but with most voters.

In the video, Clinton hints at Republicans who, to varying degrees, deny the existence of climate change while the screen populates with quotes from former Florida Governor Jeb Bush ("I'm a skeptic. I'm not a scientist."), Kentucky Senator Rand Paul ("It's absolutely and utterly untrue.") and Donald Trump ("Hoax"), among others.

“Those people on the other side, they will answer any question about climate change by saying, 'I’m not a scientist,'" Clinton said Sunday while speaking at Iowa State University in Ames, before adding a laugh-line that she also uses in the video. "Well, I’m not a scientist either. I’m just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain."

If elected, Clinton would fight back against Republican efforts to demolish the Environmental Protection Agency's Clean Power Plan, a set of regulations on greenhouse gas emissions expected to be finalized in the coming days or weeks. Those rules and others "set the floor, not the ceiling," the campaign said in its fact sheet, and Clinton would aim to encourage innovation with a Clean Energy Challenge for states, cities and rural communities to get federal support for clean energy programs.

Clinton supports extending and adding to existing tax credits to encourage the production and use of energy from renewable sources, as well as the expansion of the production and use of renewable energy on public lands and in federal buildings.

One concern that contributes to opposition—from Republicans and from some Democrats who represent coal country—to the expansion of the clean energy and the phasing out of the use of coal is what happens to all the people who work in the industry. But, Clinton said Sunday in Ames, she would focus resources on aiding regions already in decline because of the diminishing role of coal. “I will be very clear: I want to do more to help in coal country," she said.

in line to pose for a group photo with Clinton. Steyer is using his wealth to support candidates and groups that back his approach to climate change, and has already given the primary maximum $2,700 to Clinton and hosted a fundraiser for her at his San Francisco home.

On Friday, he said that candidates who he supports must have concrete plans for making clean energy at least half the overall power supply generated in the United States by 2030. Steyer is also opposed to the construction of the Keystone XL oil pipeline.

Clinton has repeatedly avoided taking a position on whether Keystone should be approved by the Obama administration, saying she wants to let the State Department-led process run its course without her interference. Others running for the Democratic presidential nomination, though, have been more clear, going right for the liberal activist base that has rallied against the project in what's become a symbolic fight for both sides. Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley both say they're opposed to the pipeline and have attacked Clinton for not doing the same.

“I have helped lead the opposition against the Keystone pipeline,” Sanders told reporters earlier this month as Clinton visited Democratic lawmakers on Capitol Hill. “I don’t believe we should be excavating or transporting some of the dirtiest fuel on this planet. I think Secretary Clinton has not been clear on her views on that issue.”

O'Malley's campaign, meanwhile, prebutted Clinton's Sunday announcement with a memo on "what real climate leadership looks like" that recaps his opposition to Keystone and to offshore and Arctic drilling, as well as his proposals to create millions of jobs by boosting the clean energy industry.

The initial reaction from climate groups to Clinton's framework was positive. "“Secretary Clinton’s spot-on video makes it more clear than ever that she cares deeply about climate change and will make it a top priority throughout her campaign," League of Conservation Voters senior vice president for government affairs Tiernan Sittenfeld said in a statement. "Her goals of getting to 500 million solar panels by 2020 and ensuring that we are producing enough renewable energy to power every home in America in ten years display the kind of leadership we need to ensure that our nation leads the world in building a clean energy economy."

Hillary Clinton Declines to Say Where She Stands on Keystone XL // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton declined Monday to weigh in on the Obama administration’s ongoing deliberations over the Keystone XL oil pipeline, avoiding an issue that has become a litmus test for climate activists.

After launching the first part of her agenda aimed at combating climate change, the former secretary of state told reporters in Iowa she “will refrain from commenting [on Keystone] because I had a leading role in getting that process started and we have to let it run its course.”

Clinton said that during her time as President Barack Obama's top diplomat, she “put together a very thorough, deliberative, evidence-based process to evaluate the environmental impact” of the proposed pipeline, which would run from Alberta, Canada, to Nebraska.

Before launching her presidential campaign, Clinton refused to comment on the pipeline permit approval process, saying she didn't want to preempt or influence the process. Monday was the first time she’d been asked since entering the race in April.

Other candidates running for the Democratic nomination have seized on Clinton’s caution and attacked her for refusing to take a definitive stance.

“I have helped lead the opposition against the Keystone pipeline,” Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders said earlier this month as Clinton visited Democratic lawmakers on Capitol Hill. “I don’t believe we should be excavating or transporting some of the dirtiest fuel on this planet. I think Secretary Clinton has not been clear on her views on that issue.”

Minutes after Clinton spoke Monday, Democratic presidential candidate and former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley's campaign criticized Clinton for what it described as a lack of leadership. “Governor O'Malley is opposed to the Keystone XL pipeline because we can't move to a clean energy future if we continue to rely on dirty, short-term fossil fuel fixes,” deputy campaign manager Lis Smith said in a statement. “Real leadership is about forging public opinion on issues like Keystone—not following it. Every Democrat should follow his lead and take a stand to commit to ending our reliance on fossil fuels.”

Clinton acknowledged that the pipeline is a politicized issue and stressed that she is in a unique position.

“No other presidential candidate was secretary of state when this process started,” she said.

Hillary Clinton sets renewable energy goals to spur more wind, solar power // Reuters // Alana Wise - July 26, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton called on Sunday for a dramatic national shift to energy sources such as solar and wind, setting a goal of generating enough clean renewable energy to power every U.S. home within a decade after she takes office.

Clinton, the front-runner for her party's 2016 presidential nomination, also pledged to have more than half a billion solar panels installed nationwide within four years of taking office.

"I want more wind, more solar, more advanced biofuels, more energy efficiency," Clinton said at a rally on Sunday in Ames, Iowa. "And I’ve got to tell you, people who argue against this are just not paying attention."

The two goals, announced in a video on Sunday night, were the first elements of what Clinton said would be a comprehensive climate-change agenda to be released over the next few months.

Clinton has been under pressure from Democratic presidential rival Senator Bernie Sanders, a self-styled socialist who has called for swift action on climate change, and environmental activists anxious to see her spell out details of a climate plan.

Her campaign said the goals would lead to a 700 percent increase in the nation's installed solar capacity from current levels, and eventually could lead to the generation of at least one third of all electricity from renewable sources.

Clinton also called for extending federal clean energy tax incentives and making them more cost effective. In Ames, Clinton said she would continue the wind production tax credit and recalibrate other tax incentives that are "too heavily weighted ... toward fossil fuels."

Clinton also said she would fight efforts to roll back President Barack Obama's executive actions to curb carbon emissions from power plants. She said the actions could build a "clean energy economy" that would bolster growth.

"If we start addressing it, we're going to actually be creating jobs and new businesses," she said.

Clinton will discuss the proposals on Monday at an energy-efficient transit station in Iowa, the state that kicks off the 2016 presidential nominating race and is a leading wind energy producer.

Clinton praised Iowa for promoting wind energy and advanced biofuels, and for establishing state tax rebates for installing solar panels in homes and businesses.

She criticized Republicans who are reluctant to say climate change is a man-made phenomenon.

"They will answer any question about climate change by saying: 'I'm not a scientist.' Well, I'm not a scientist either. I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain and I know we're facing a huge problem," Clinton said.

Clinton vows to boost U.S. clean energy use in response to climate change // Reuters // Alana Wise – July 27, 2015

U.S. presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Monday described climate change as "one of most urgent threats of our time" and vowed to meet the challenge with a plan to generate enough clean energy to power every U.S. home by 2027.

The Democratic front-runner compared fighting climate change to the race to put an American on the moon by the end of the 1960s.

"The next decade will be as decisive for climate change as the decade for getting to the moon was for space exploration," Clinton said at a campaign stop in Iowa, which will hold the first presidential nominating contest in February.

"Sea levels are rising, ice caps are melting, storms, wildfires and extreme weather are wreaking havoc. This is one of most urgent threats of our time and we have no choice but to rise and meet it," said Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination in the November 2016 election.

Clinton promised to have more than half a billion solar panels installed nationwide within four years if she makes it to the White House.

The former secretary of state has been under pressure from Democratic presidential rival Senator Bernie Sanders, a self-described socialist who has called for swift action on climate change, and environmental activists anxious to see her spell out details of a climate plan.

She vowed to "stop the giveaways to big oil companies" and to defend President Barack Obama's plan to reduce emissions from power plants, which is hitting the coal industry.

More details of Clinton's climate change agenda will be released over the next few months.

The Republican National Committee said Clinton's energy policies were vague and aimed at distracting attention from the controversy of her use of a private email account while she ran the State Department.

"Hillary Clinton's energy 'plan' is to raise more taxes and double down on President Obama's EPA overreach, which held down wages and cost American jobs. Clinton avoided specifics and refused to take a position on important job-creating energy projects like the Keystone pipeline, reminding voters why they think she's untrustworthy," said RNC spokesman Michael Short.

Hillary Clinton pushes renewable energy with focus on solar // CNN // Dan Merica – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton pledged Sunday that as president she would put the United States on a path toward generating enough renewable energy to power every home in the country by 2027 - ten years after she would hypothetically take office.

In a video posted to her campaign website, Clinton knocked Republicans for refusing "to accept the settled science of climate change" and cast her push as a fight for children and grandchildren.

"I am just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain and I know what is happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter and especially my granddaughters," Clinton said, using a line she often delivers at campaign events. "You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all. You just have to be willing to act."

The video - titled "Stand for Reality" - featured a slate of quotes from Republicans on climate change, including when former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush told Esquire Magazine in 2009, "I'm a skeptic. I'm not a scientist." The slate also included quotes from Sens. Marco Rubio, Ted Cruz and Rand Paul.

"You don't have to be a scientist to accept scientific evidence," Clinton tweeted. "Climate change is real and we must act. -H."

Clinton's plan focuses largely on residential power usage and is buoyed by a focus on solar. By the end of her hypothetical first term as president, Clinton promised that the United States would have more than 500 million solar panels installed across the country.

The presidential candidate also stressed building an energy grid more focused on renewable energy, particularly solar, by the end of the decade. According to a fact sheet circulated by Clinton's campaign, a Clinton presidency would hope to increase output of solar energy by 700% by the end of the decade.

On Monday, Clinton will expand on her clean energy push in Iowa when she tours that LEED Platinum certified Des Moines Area Regional Transit (DART) Central Station.

Clinton's said he plan would incentivize investment in renewables by increasing the number of government grants for clean energy, extending federal clean energy tax incentives and expanding renewable energy on public lands.

"The decisions we make in the next decade can make all of this possible. Or, they can keep us trapped in the past," Clinton says in the video. "We cannot wait any longer. It is time we stand for healthier climate, stand for cleaner air, for science, for innovation, for our children. For reality, for the future."

The former secretary of state's clean energy pitch comes at a time where many Democrats are focused on climate change, particularly the need to decrease the use of fossil fuels. According to the World Bank, over 85% of U.S. energy consumption came from fossil fuels.

Clinton was confronted by climate change protestors at a town hall earlier this month in New Hampshire. The former secretary of state was first asked a "yes or no" question about banning the extraction of fossil fuels from public grounds. Clinton did not give the protestors the answer they wanted, telling them she would not ban the practice until alternatives were in place.

According to the fact sheet, Clinton does not rule out using federal land for fossil fuel development, but says that she would ensure "taxpayers get a fair deal for development on public lands, and that areas that are too sensitive for energy production are taken off the table."

Some of Clinton's top supporters have also been outspoken on the need for 2016 Democrats to tackle climate change.

Tom Steyer, a hedge fund billionaire and the head of NextGen Climate, a non-profit focused on climate change, issued an open letter on Friday that called for all 2016 Democrats to "lay out a clear and concrete plan to achieve at least 50 percent clean or carbon-free energy by 2030."

"Whether or not candidates make this commitment will be a critical factor for Americans who are deciding what candidates to support at polls," wrote Steyer, who has already hosted a fundraiser for Clinton at his home in California.

An aide to Steyer tells CNN that Clinton's energy proposal meets the standard the environmentalist outlined last week.

Clinton's campaign claimed Sunday that their plan matches the Steyer pledge, but a supportive statement from the environmentalist did not outright say Clinton's plan met his standards.

He did call the plan "an ambitious framework to put our nation on a path to a clean energy economy," adding that Clinton "emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis and ensuring our country's economic security" due to the proposal.

Campaign aides stressed that Sunday's announcement was their opening salvo, not their entire clean energy platform, and Clinton herself said in the video that she will lay out her entire platform "over the next few months."

But other 2016 Democrats were quick to pounce on Clinton's proposal.

In a memo titled, "What Real Climate Leadership Looks Like," Lis Smith, Martin O'Malley's deputy campaign manager, stressed that the former Maryland governor outlined his clean energy plan last month and has backed up his plan with "action, not just words."

"Eschewing the piecemeal, poll-tested 'all of the above' energy strategies of the past, O'Malley has made clear that he will use the full force of his executive power to make the transition to a clean energy future the number one priority of our federal government," Smith wrote.

Despite the critics, Clinton's plans was met with warm regard from environmental groups.

Tiernan Sittenfeld, an executive for the League of Conservation Voters Action Fund, called Clinton's video "spot on" and said it proved Clinton "will make it a top priority throughout her campaign."

"This," Sittenfeld sad, "underscores Secretary Clinton's longtime commitment to confronting the climate crisis."

Here is Hillary Clinton's climate plan // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald - July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton will roll out a comprehensive climate and energy policy proposal Monday that would dramatically increase the country's use of renewable energy.

Clinton's plan, which she will unveil at an energy efficient transit hub in Iowa, will promise to create enough clean renewable energy to power every home in the U.S. within 10 years of Clinton taking office.

That includes a 700% increase in solar panel installation by the end of her hypothetical first term, for a total of half a billion installed solar panels. Clinton will also call for a rapid expansion of power generation capacity from wind, hydro, geothermal, and other renewable sources.

The former secretary of state will also propose incentives for the technological development of solar and other sources through a number of partnerships and competitions. For instance, she would create a "Solar x-prize" for communities that make it easier to install roof-top panels. And she would create new tax incentives and competitive grants to encourage states and the private sector to invest in clean energy.

She will also call for improvements to the electrical grid, expanding renewable energy production on public lands and increase federal R&D funding.

"I am setting some really high goals that we are going to meet when I am president," Clinton said in Ames, Iowa Sunday.

Clinton's plan would also adopt a proposal known as "Deep Decarbonization Pathways," an international partnership of high-emitting countries that works to find ways to transition industrial countries to low-carbon economies.

"The decisions we make in the next decade can make all of this possible or they can keep us trapped in the past," Clinton said in a video posted to her website previewing the plan. "We cannot wait any longer."

In the video, Clinton also goes after Republicans, listing quotes from top GOP presidential candidates casting doubt on the science of climate change.

Billionaire Clinton donor Tom Steyer, who funds his own climate group and is pushing Democrats to be more aggressive on global warming, called Clinton's plan an "ambitious framework" and said it made her "a strong leader in solving the climate crisis."

Democratic rival Martin O'Malley has already rolled out a plan that he promise would transition the country 100% renewable energy, and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders often says climate change is a top priority.

Hillary Clinton Calls Out GOP Climate Change Deniers in New 'Stand With Reality' Video // ABC // Liz Kreutz - July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton today attacked the Republican presidential contenders who deny "the settled science of climate change" and laid out two renewable power goals in a new video that outlines part of her plan to tackle global warming.

"It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change, who would rather remind us they're not scientists than listen to those who are," Clinton narrates over a graphic that shows quotes from Republican presidential candidates, including Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, and Donald Trump.

"You don't have to be scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all. You just have to be willing to act," she continues.

By contrast, in the video -- titled "Stand with Reality" -- Clinton calls herself "just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain" who knows that "what's happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter and especially on my granddaughter."

Clinton then lays out two national goals that she would implement "on day one as president."

The first pledge: to have more than half a billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of her first term. And the second: to have the U.S. generate enough clean renewable energy to power every home in America within 10 years.

"The decisions we make in the next decade can make all of this possible, or they can keep us trapped in the past," Clinton says. "We cannot wait any longer."

On the campaign trail, Clinton repeatedly calls for a "global fight against climate change," which she says is "one of the defining threats of our time." The video, which was posted to her campaign website Sunday night, however, is the first time the Democratic presidential candidate has laid out specific policy proposals on how she would plan to tackle the issue should she become president.

While Revealing Climate Plan, Clinton Mum on Keystone // ABC // Andrew Rafferty – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton pledged Monday to make America "the world's clean energy superpower," but said her former role as secretary of state prevents her from weighing in on the controversial Keystone XL pipeline, even as her Democratic opponents stand in firm opposition to it.

"No other presidential candidate was secretary of state when this process started," Clinton told reporters in Iowa after laying out her plans to combat climate change.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I'm confident that the pipeline's impact on global greenhouse gas emissions will be a major factor in that decision, as the president has said," Clinton added. "So I will refrain from commenting because I had a leading role in getting that process started."

Clinton has refrained from commenting on the pipeline's construction in the past, and her remarks Monday seemed to be a definitive indication that she will not weigh in until the final Obama administration review is complete.

Democratic presidential candidates Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders have been open about their opposition to the pipeline that would bring oil from Canadian tar sands to the Gulf Coast.

"Real leadership is about forging public opinion on issues like Keystone -- not following it," O'Malley deputy campaign manager Lis Smith said.

Republicans presidential candidates have called for its construction, saying the pipeline will help create jobs and promote energy independence.

In her speech, Clinton laid out two goals she would begin working on her first day as president -- install more than half a billion solar panels across the country by the end of her first term and have the U.S. generate enough clean energy to power every home in America in the next ten years.

Clinton's attempts to elevate the issue of climate change in the 2016 election allow her to create a clear distinction with her GOP opponents who have denied or questioned the threat of climate change. A video released by her campaign ahead of the speech featured quotes from a number of her top Republican White House hopefuls expressing skepticism or denial about the existence of global warming.

"I refuse to let those who are deniers, who disagree with what we need to do, to rip away all the progress we have made and leave our country exposed to the most severe consequences of climate change," Clinton said. "America needs to lead this fight, not go MIA."

Republican National Committee spokesman Michael Short said Clinton's energy agenda is "to raise more taxes and double down on President Obama's EPA overreach," and slammed her for not taking a stance on Keystone.

Hillary Clinton Says Climate Plan Will Promote Renewables // NBC // July 26, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton planned to unveil a plan Sunday aimed at combating climate change that includes revisions in the tax code to promote renewable energy.

In Iowa, the nation's second-leading wind energy producer, Clinton said people are "just not paying attention" if they don't acknowledge climate change.

Clinton said she supported renewing the wind energy tax credit and getting other tax incentives "fixed" to promote renewable fuel.

Though Clinton hinted that under her plan the coal industry would face changes, she said the federal government would help the industry.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Climate change has become a key issue in the Democratic presidential primary, where Clinton is the heavy favorite. Billionaire Tom Steyer has led an effort to promote the issue. Steyer hosted a fundraiser for Clinton in May.

"We can make a transition over time from a fossil fuel economy, predominantly, to a clean renewable energy economy, predominantly," Clinton said later during an event at a central Iowa rural home.

Changes in the tax code aimed at promoting renewable energy and transitioning away from coal is a tricky political position in key places in the country. Southeast Ohio and western Pennsylvania, states that have been pivotal in recent elections, remain the home of key coal-producing areas.

Clinton was making her comments at Iowa State University in Ames and later in Carroll.

Clinton said she planned to post the plan on her campaign website at 7 p.m. EDT, and explain it in more detail during an event Monday in Des Moines.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, also seeking the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, noted Sunday that he unveiled a climate change plan in Iowa. Campaign aides to O'Malley said that as governor, he made climate change a top priority, doubled Maryland's renewable fuel production, and reduced greenhouse gases by 10 percent during his two terms.

Clinton sets goals for solar panels, clean energy // CBS // Rebecca Kaplan and Hannah Fraser-Chanpong – July 27, 2015

Presidential candidate Hillary Clinton announced Sunday that her plans to combat climate change as president include installing more than half a billion solar panels across the U.S. by the end of her first term and generating enough clean renewable energy to power every home in America within 10 years of taking office.

Clinton, the frontrunner for the 2016 Democratic nomination, announced the goals in a video released by her campaign Sunday evening. Her campaign said the two initiatives were part of a comprehensive energy and climate agenda she'll lay out over the next several months.

"Future generations will look back and think 'what were we thinking, how could we possibly be so irresponsible?' " Clinton says as the narrator of a video that features images of children, wildlife, and images associated with energy production. "I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and brain and I know what's happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter and especially on my granddaughter."

The video also takes direct aim at the Republican presidential candidates for statements skeptical of climate change. Clinton speaks, the video shows quotes from candidates including former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush ("I'm a skeptic. I'm not a scientist"), Florida Sen. Marco Rubio ("I'm not a scientist") and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz ("There's been no warming whatsoever") and other candidates.

"It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change who would rather remind us they're not scientists than listen to those who are," Clinton says. "You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all, you just have to be wiling to act."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton argues that increasing the use of wind, solar, hydro, geothermal and other renewable energy will help prevent as many as 3,000 premature deaths and 700,000 asthma attacks each year.

Expanding the installation of solar panels across the U.S. would increase the current capacity to 140 gigawatts by the end of 2020, a 700 percent increase her campaign said. It would be like having rooftop solar systems on 25 million houses across the country.

A fact sheet released by the campaign offered a number of federal government initiatives Clinton would implement to help reach the goals, including partnerships with states, cities and rural communities that are leading on clean energy, competitive grants to states that exceed federal carbon pollution standards, awards for communities that make it easier and cheaper to install rooftop solar systems, strengthening grid reliability and resilience, and making it easier to get low-cost renewable energy to market.

She is also promising to talk about plans to reduce oil consumption in the U.S. and around the world, improve the safety and security of the existing energy infrastructure, make fossil fuel production safer, and protect the health and retirement security of former coal workers and their families.

At an event in Iowa Sunday, Clinton said those who don't acknowledge the existence of climate change are "just not paying attention." Iowa is the second-largest producer of wind-generated electricity in the nation, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

Clinton's plan follows one laid out by another Democratic candidate, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, which promises to end the country's reliance on fossil fuels entirely by 2050 and to double American energy efficiency within 15 years. O'Malley promises an entire nation powered by renewable energy within the 35 years, as opposed to Clinton's pledge to power every home with renewable energy in 10 years.

Though Clinton has not revealed the full extent of her policies to address climate change, O'Malley said he would deny permits for drilling off the coasts of Alaska and Antarctic and promises not to build the Keystone XL pipeline. Clinton has not yet said what she would do about the pipeline.

Clinton's biggest challenger for the Democratic nomination, Independent Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, regularly talks about climate change in his stump speech, describing dire weather conditions created by the warming of the planet. He has not yet laid out a formal plan to combat climate change, although last month he introduced legislation which would provide $200 million in loans and grants for solar panels on public housing and low-income family homes.

Hillary Clinton Focuses On Renewable Energy In Climate Change Plan // HuffPo // Marina Fang - July 26, 2015

In an ambitious climate change plan, Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton pledged to make sure every American home is powered by renewable energy by 2027 if elected president and install half a billion solar panels around the country before the end of her first term.

Her campaign released a copy of the plan Sunday evening. Clinton spoke about climate change at two campaign events in Iowa earlier in the day, telling supporters that climate change deniers are “just not paying attention.”

"Those people on the other side, they will answer any question about climate change by saying, 'I’m not a scientist.' Well, I’m not a scientist either. I’m just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's proposal also calls for promoting tax credits to incentivize a push toward renewable energy and away from coal.

"We can make a transition over time from a fossil fuel economy, predominantly, to a clean renewable energy economy, predominantly," she said on Sunday.

Clinton plans to address these proposals in more detail at an event on Monday, according to her campaign. The plan is a preview of more specific policy positions that she will announce in the coming months, which will include a Clean Energy Challenge involving competitive grants for states and municipalities to develop and implement renewable energy solutions.

On Sunday evening, environmental groups such as the Sierra Club and the League of Conservation Voters quickly issued statements applauding Clinton's plan.

Climate change activist Tom Steyer endorsed Clinton's plan in a statement, calling her "a strong leader in solving the climate crisis."

"I look forward to other candidates laying out aggressive plans to tackle climate change head-on. It's time for all leaders to acknowledge the problem our country faces and engage in a robust debate about the best way to tackle climate change and build a clean energy economy," he said.

The billionaire founder of NextGen Climate, who hosted a Clinton fundraiser at his San Francisco home in May, called for all of the presidential candidates to develop concrete plans to increase clean energy usage. Steyer said last Friday that he would not support candidates without such proposals.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D), one of Clinton's challengers in the race, unveiled a climate change plan last month. Responding to Clinton, his campaign noted Sunday that as governor of Maryland, he doubled the state's renewable fuel production and reduced greenhouse gas emissions by 10 percent.

O'Malley and fellow Democratic presidential hopeful Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) have also been outspoken against the construction of the Keystone XL pipeline, while Clinton has largely avoided the issue.

Hillary Clinton Pledges to Install 500 Million Solar Panels If Voted President // TIME // Helen Regan - July 26, 2015

"We are on the cusp of a new era"

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Sunday made tackling climate change one of her key goals were she to enter the White House, pledging to have more than half a billion solar panels installed nationwide by the end of her first term in office.

Clinton also called for a major increase in other renewable energy sources, saying she wants every U.S. home to be powered by clean energy within a decade, reports Reuters.

"I want more wind, more solar, more advanced biofuels, more energy efficiency," she said at a weekend rally in Iowa. "And I've got to tell you, people who argue against this are just not paying attention."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The two goals were unveiled in a video posted to Clinton's campaign website Sunday, and are part of a comprehensive agenda on climate change that will be laid out over the next few months.

"We are on the cusp of a new era," she said in the campaign video. "We can have more choice in the energy we consume and produce."

According to the former Secretary of State's campaign, her climate change agenda will increase output of solar energy by 700% by the end of the decade.

On Monday, the presidential candidate will explain her clean energy plan in more detail at a tour of an energy-efficient transit station in Des Moines, Iowa.

Hillary Clinton sticks to safe ground on climate // Vox // Jonathan Allen – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton unveiled a proposal to combat climate change last night, and it appears to be in the pragmatic Clintonian space of sticking to safe ground. Rather than trying to outdo her Democratic rivals, Clinton's plan seems designed to allow her to contrast with Republicans who either don't acknowledge the reality of climate change or aren't really ready to do anything about it. As Seema Mehta and Evan Halper of the LA Times report, Clinton says her approach would put the US on a path to have all homes and businesses powered by renewable energy by 2027 — a goal her campaign frames as both light on details and far short of where environmentalists would like her to be.

The Clinton package is incomplete, however. Unlike her rivals in the Democratic presidential contest, Clinton has yet to take a position on the controversial Keystone XL pipeline, which would transport oil from the Canadian tar sands to Gulf Coast ports. She also has yet to weigh in on a campaign to ban hydraulic fracturing nationwide, or to take a firm position on offshore oil drilling.

The proposal Clinton released Sunday for boosting solar installations by 700% is vague on details about how it would be funded.

Clinton continues to enjoy a commanding lead among Democratic primary voters. She seems unconcerned by the more detailed and aggressive proposals offered by challengers within her party.

Vox's Brad Plumer writes that Clinton's goal involves a 700 percent increase in solar power between now and 2020 — and concludes that it's possible to achieve that level.

US solar capacity grew 418 percent between 2010 and 2014 (it was starting from a small base). So 700 percent growth between 2014 and 2020 is at least within the realm of possibility. But it would require additional policy changes — and clean energy prices would have to keep dropping.

Hillary Clinton is calling for a 700% increase in solar power. Is that realistic? // Vox // Brad Plumer - July 26, 2015

In the coming months, Hillary Clinton's campaign is planning to release a series of proposals for dealing with global warming. Her first installment is out Sunday evening, and it calls for a major increase in renewable power.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Specifically, she's proposing to boost the amount of wind, solar, and other renewables so that they provide 33 percent of America's electricity by 2027 — enough to power every home in the country:

Let's put this in perspective. Renewable energy currently supplies just 13 percent of America's electricity, with hydropower providing 6 percent, wind power providing 4.4 percent, and the rest coming from biomass, geothermal, and solar.

Without new policies, the government expects that fraction to rise to 16 percent by 2027. If you add on President Obama's forthcoming Clean Power Plan — an EPA program to reduce carbon-dioxide emissions from power plants — then renewables are projected to grow to 25 percent of US electricity by 2027.

Clinton is proposing to bump that up even further, to 33 percent. One key question is how.

Clinton's plan calls for a 700% increase in solar power

Part of her plan would involve continuing the rapid growth of solar panel installations nationwide. In her proposal, Clinton calls for US solar power to grow 700 percent from current levels:

That sounds like a big number, but it's not implausible. After all, US solar capacity grew 418 percent between 2010 and 2014, so 700 percent growth by 2027 is at least within the realm of possibility. It would require the right policies in place (and for solar prices to keep dropping).

On that score, Clinton's campaign offered a number of policy proposals for boosting renewables:

-- First, if elected president, Clinton would veto any attempts by Republicans in Congress to scrap Obama's Clean Power Plan. This is mostly a defensive maneuver.

-- Second, she'd push to extend the federal tax credits for wind and solar that are scheduled to expire soon. (The 30 percent tax credit for residential solar systems is set to disappear in 2016.) This is a key step, but it would depend entirely on Congress. It's not something Clinton could ever do on her own. And note many lawmakers would prefer to let these tax credits sunset, so this proposal is hardly guaranteed.

-- Third, Clinton wants to set up a "Clean Energy Challenge" that would gives states and localities incentives to go even further than the carbon standards the EPA is putting out. The campaign says it will offer more details on this in the coming weeks and months. One component? A "Solar X-prize" that would reward communities that figured out how to cut red tape and speed up solar installation times.

-- Clinton also has a smattering of proposals to boost public investment in clean energy R&D, in transmission lines, and in renewable installation on public lands.

-- Finally, Clinton calls for aid to coal communities that will inevitably suffer if coal continues to decline in favor of cleaner energy sources. No details on this yet, but her campaign notes that the government should "provide economic opportunities for those that kept the lights on and factories running for more than a century." (Note that the Obama administration has proposed a $3 billion aid package for coal communities, but few members of Congress seem interested for now.)

How ambitious is Clinton's renewables goal? It depends how you look at it.

If the US actually managed to get 33 percent of its electricity from renewables in 2027 and we kept most of our nuclear plants running (which currently supply another 19 percent), then the country would be getting roughly half its electricity from zero-carbon sources.

That would obviously be a major shift from where we are today. It's also in line with the "50% clean energy by 2030" goal that green activist and billionaire Tom Steyer is demanding candidates get behind.

On the other hand, this isn't, by itself, a comprehensive climate plan. Electricity only accounts for 38 percent of US carbon-dioxide emissions. Other major sources include transportation (i.e., cars, trucks, and planes that burn oil), industrial processes (i.e., cement plants or chemical plants that use coal or gas), homes and buildings that use natural gas for heating, and so on:

So boosting renewable electricity is only one part of the picture here. We'll see what else Clinton ends up proposing.

Could the US electric grid handle that much wind and solar?

This is another big question about Clinton's proposal. As wind and solar expand, US grid operators will face challenges integrating all these intermittent sources of electricity. After all, the sun isn't always blowing and the wind isn't always shining.

This is a little hard to answer, just because it would depend on the precise mix of renewables, where the growth in wind and solar occurred, whether utility regulators made certain policy changes, and so forth.

But for context, my colleague David Roberts has written an excellent series on the challenges that wind and solar pose to the grid. Part one looks at the hassles of dealing with intermittent renewables. Part two looks at how solar and wind start to face severe economic limitations past a certain point (and Clinton's stated goals would put wind and solar within striking distance of those levels). And part three looks at potential market reforms that could ease these constraints. Definitely read that series if you haven't already.

Hillary Clinton's Climate-Change Plan Is Anything But Comprehensive // TNR // Rebecca Leber – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton has unveiled a plan for tackling climate change—or, more accurately, part of a plan, with the promise of additional announcements in the coming months. The Democratic presidential frontrunner detailed a plank of her environmental platform on her website Sunday night, for making the United States "the world's clean energy superpower." But on fossil fuels, where environmentalists have remained the most skeptical of her intentions, Clinton's plans remain vague.

Clinton announced two ambitious goals:

"Have more than half a billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of Hillary's first term"—a 700 percent increase in solar capacity that would power 25 million homes.

"Generate enough renewable energy to power every home in America within 10 years of Hillary taking office," which would require expanding renewables (wind, solar, geothermal, and hydropower) enough to power 33 percent of the U.S. electricity sector by 2027, up from just 13 percent today.

Campaign chair John Podesta, a former White House senior adviser on climate change, characterized the plan as historic. "Her proposals provide incentives for businesses and individuals to gain access to renewable energy and lower their monthly bills," he wrote Monday. "It pairs national action with a commitment to provide more resources to the groundswell of states and cities that are taking innovative actions above and beyond federal policies."

The League of Conservation Voters and Democratic billionaire donor Tom Steyer both praised Clinton's announcement, but she hasn't satisfied all environmentalists' demands for a comprehensive climate action plan. Clinton hasn't said where she stands on the Keystone XL pipeline, tar sands oil extraction, natural gas, fracking, and Arctic drilling. Surely, Clinton's position on these areas will be more controversial than her targets for clean energy. Climate Hawks Vote said in a statement that "Clinton's climate plan is remarkable for what it does't say, yet: no effort to keep fossil fuels in the ground, no price on carbon; no word on Keystone XL, Arctic oil, or other carbon bombs; no word on fracking; no call for adaptation."

But by releasing a plan for clean energy, Clinton has achieved two things.

First, it helps to blunt environmentalists' criticism of Clinton for her relative silence on the issue. Former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley has a plan to achieve 100 percent renewable electricity by 2050—what "real climate leadership looks like," his campaign declared in a memo to reporters before Clinton's announcement. Senator Bernie Sanders hasn't announced a climate change plan yet, but has supported bills for rooftop solar, opposes Keystone, and overall has (by at least one count) the best environmental record of any senator.

Second, Clinton has answered Steyer's challenge. On Friday, the green donor set his first expectation for candidates wanting his support in the 2016 election, requiring that they first lay out a plan to reach at least 50 percent renewables in the electricity sector by 2030. The Clinton campaign noted on Twitter that it passed Steyer's test, if you count existing nuclear energy, at 19 percent. Steyer's campaign arm NextGen Climate counts nuclear in its 50 percent tally:

And Steyer is satisfied with Clinton's answer, for now. 'Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis and ensuring our country's economic security," he said in a statement. "Clinton laid out an ambitious framework to put our nation on a path to a clean energy economy that will create millions of jobs—and in the coming months we look forward to hearing more details about her proposals to tackle climate change."

But Clinton's climate plan can't ignore more difficult questions on how much to rely on fossil fuels during the transition to cleaner power. As Vox's Brad Plumer notes, electricity accounts for 38 percent of U.S. carbon emissions—transportation, buildings powered by gas, industry, and more make up the rest. There's also methane, a particularly potent emission that is on the rise in agriculture, landfills, and the oil and gas sectors.

Until she rolls out the rest of her climate platform, Clinton's still vulnerable to criticism from progressive environmentalists. Friends of the Earth spokesperson Ben Schreiber said that "while it is great that Secretary Clinton has recognized the importance of renewable energy, the reality is that her plan will not lead to the transformation that we desperately need. If we are going to avoid the worst impacts of climate change we are going to need an Apollo program for renewable energy, not just the corporate stimulus that Secretary Clinton has offered."

Hillary Rodham Clinton sought to position herself as a crusader against climate change Sunday by unveiling some robust goals, even as she continued to avoid some of the more contentious battles around global warming.

Clinton announced that she will push to vastly expand the number of solar panels installed in the United States, as well as to boost overall renewable energy to the point that it will be able to fuel all homes and businesses by 2027.

The proposals reflect Clinton's commitment to continuing the path on climate change set by President Obama, who champions numerous policies that bolster renewables and push a reduction in fossil fuel consumption.

The Clinton package is incomplete, however. Unlike her rivals in the Democratic presidential contest, Clinton has yet to take a position on the controversial Keystone XL pipeline, which would transport oil from the Canadian tar sands to Gulf Coast ports. She also has yet to weigh in on a campaign to ban hydraulic fracturing nationwide, or to take a firm position on offshore oil drilling.

The proposal Clinton released Sunday for boosting solar installations by 700% is vague on details about how it would be funded.

Clinton continues to enjoy a commanding lead among Democratic primary voters. She seems unconcerned by the more detailed and aggressive proposals offered by challengers within her party.

Clinton's plan, which campaign officials said is just the first part of a larger platform that will be rolled out gradually, appeared to be aimed squarely at distinguishing her from Republicans.

In a campaign video detailing her plan, Clinton said, "It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change, who would rather remind us they're not scientists than listen to those who are."

As Clinton speaks in the video, quotes from GOP candidates expressing skepticism that global warming is a real threat appear on the screen. Climate change has proved a challenging issue for Republican politicians, many of whom are critical of energy policies aimed at curbing it.

Polls show that most voters believe climate change is a real threat and they want action taken. But voters also rarely cite it as their top concern.

Hillary Clinton draws contrast with Republicans as she lays out economic plan

Regardless, the issue works well for Clinton as she campaigns in Iowa, a leader in wind production. The industry's rapid expansion here has been made possible in large part because of federal tax credits.

At a rally before about 400 people in Ames, Clinton cited the wind turbines sprouting on farms across the state.

She voiced her support for continuing the wind production credit, saying the nation's tax code is weighted too heavily in favor of fossil fuels rather than renewable energy.

Continuation of such incentives is cited in the brief fact sheet the Clinton campaign distributed Sunday night. It also included programs to award states that are the most aggressive on renewable energy with more federal funding, a reduction in red tape that inhibits the expansion of solar energy and policy changes that would make solar power affordable for low-income households.

At the center of this part of Clinton's energy agenda is a policy recently implemented by Obama. Clinton vows to be a protector of the Clean Power Plan, which puts strict limits on the amount of greenhouse gases power plants can release. Several states have gone to court seeking to block enforcement of the new rules.

Clinton also praised coal miners' contributions to economic growth, a tacit acknowledgment that the shift toward clean energy is viewed skeptically by communities reliant on coal for their livelihoods. Many of those areas, including in battleground states like Ohio, are home to conservative white Democrats crucial to Clinton's White House hopes.

"It's important that we help them transition to a new economy," she said. "I want to do more to help people in coal country and other parts of our nation that are not enjoying the kind of growth and development and prosperity we're seeing in a place like Story County," where the rally was taking place.

Some environmentalists are uneasy with Clinton's approach so far to climate change. They would like to have seen her work as secretary of State to scuttle the Keystone project. Her relationships with donors and advisors connected to large fossil fuel companies make them anxious. And her support during her 2008 presidential run for "clean coal" as a viable, green alternative has not been forgotten.

At a town hall event in New Hampshire this month, an activist with 350.org pushed her to commit to banning fossil fuel extraction on public land. Clinton declined to do so, saying such energy production is necessary to keep the economy moving until there are enough alternatives in place.

Hillary Clinton Refuses to Take a Position on the Keystone Pipeline // Mother Jones // Tim McDonnell – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton took a strong stance on clean energy Monday, telling a crowd in Des Moines, Iowa, that her efforts to tackle climate change would parallel President John F. Kennedy's call to action during the space race in the 1960s.

"I want to get the country back to setting big ambitious goals," Clinton said. "I want us to get back into the future business, and one of the best ways we can do that is to be absolutely ready to address the challenge of climate change and make it work to our advantage economically."

Her remarks tracked closely with an ambitious plan her campaign released Sunday night, which set a target of producing enough renewable energy to power all the nation's homes and businesses by 2027.

"America's ability to lead the world on this issue hinges on our ability to act ourselves," she said. "I refuse to turn my back on what is one of the greatest threats and greatest opportunities America faces."

"I think it's bogus," said Bill McKibben. "The more she tries to duck the question, the more the whole thing smells."

Still, the Democractic front-runner refused—as she has several times before—to say whether or not she supports construction of the Keystone XL pipeline. That project, which would carry crude oil from Canada's tar sands to refineries and ports in the United States, is seen by many environmentalists as a blemish on President Barack Obama's climate record. It has been stalled for years in a lengthy State Department review that began when Clinton was still Secretary of State. The Obama administration has resisted several recent attempts by Congress to force Keystone's approval, but it has yet to make a final decision on the project—although one is expected sometime this year.

"I will refrain from commenting [on Keystone XL], because I had a leading role in getting that process started, and we have to let it run its course," Clinton said, in response to a question from an audience member.

Her non-position on Keystone earned derision from environmentalist Bill McKibben, whose organization 350.org has been at the forefront of opposition to the pipeline.

"I think it's bogus," he said in an email. "Look, the notion that she can't talk about it because the State Dept. is still working on it makes no sense. By that test, she shouldn't be talking about Benghazi or Iran or anything else either. The more she tries to duck the question, the more the whole thing smells."

Clinton also punted on an audience request to reveal further details of how exactly she would finance the renewable energy targets she announced yesterday, which aim even higher than those already put in place by Obama. She reiterated that one key step would be to ensure the extension of federal tax credits for wind and solar energy that have expired or are set to expire over the next few years. And she said that she would continue Obama's practice of pursuing aggressive climate policies from within the White House, saying that "we still have a lot we can do" without waiting for a recalcitrant Congress to act.

Clinton acknowledged that the clean energy boom would come at a cost for the US coal industry, which is already in steep decline. She said she would "guarantee that coal miners and their families get the benefits they've earned," but didn't elaborate on what she meant or how specifically she would achieve that.

Environmental groups offered a generally positive reaction to Clinton's policy announcement Sunday. In a statement, League of Conservation Voters vice president Tiernan Sittenfield commended her for "calling out climate change deniers and effectively illustrating the urgent need to act on a defining issue of our time." She also earned praise from billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer, who has set a high bar on climate action for any candidate who wants to tap his millions.

"I refuse to let those who are deniers to rip away all the progress we've made and leave our country exposed to climate change," Clinton said.

Hillary Clinton Just Went Big on Clean Energy. That Was the Easy Part. // Slate // Josh Voorhees – July 27, 2015

At long last, Hillary Clinton has finally given the climate crowd something to get excited about. On Sunday the Democratic hopeful unveiled the first specific plank of what she is promising will be a comprehensive plan to address global warming. Clinton's bold-faced goals are something to behold: Installing more than half a billion solar panels in the United States by the end of her first term, and generating enough clean energy to power every home in the country within a decade of taking office.

Her energy proposal won't be enough to completely win over climate hawks, who have been skeptical of her environmental bona fides—but it's a solid start. Climate activists have long demanded that the next president go further than President Obama, and Clinton's proposal would do just that. In addition to protecting the historic climate rules being implemented by Obama's Environmental Protection Agency, Clinton is pledging to boost solar, wind, and other renewables to the point where they provide 33 percent of the country's electricity by 2027. Obama, meanwhile, has put the country on the path to reach about 25 percent by that same year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Exactly how Clinton would get us to her goal remains unclear. But the broad brushstrokes suggest she'd rely heavily on tax incentives to spur the growth of renewables—particularly solar, which she says would see a 700 percent increase in U.S. capacity under her plan. At the center of her proposal is what her campaign has dubbed the Clean Energy Challenge, which would include: grants and "other market-based incentives" to encourage states to go above and beyond the actions required by federal law; a boost to federal investment in clean energy R&D; and an expansion of renewable production on public lands. She's also expected to push to extend current federal tax credits for solar and wind that are set to expire soon. Clinton's campaign pegs the estimated cost of the entire plan at about $60 billion over 10 years, which would be offset by eliminating tax breaks for the oil and gas industry.

"We need to get the incentives fixed in our tax system, which as you know are too heavily weighted toward fossil fuels," Clinton said Sunday while campaigning in central Iowa ahead of her more formal climate rollout on Monday in Des Moines.

My colleague Eric Holthaus will have much more on the policy specifics and how they stack up against the plans already put forth by Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley in a bit. But on the strictly political side of the equation, it's clear that Clinton's proposal is clever. She's telling Americans what she'll add—rooftop solar for more than 25 million homes!—without having to address the more politically fraught conversation of what she's willing to subtract. Notably missing from the policy rollout was any mention of blocking Keystone XL, the controversial pipeline that has become a high-profile litmus test for the climate crowd, or a pledge to curb fossil fuel extraction on public lands.

Clinton's got a ways to go before fully captivating the climate hawks. The four-page fact sheet released by her campaign offered only vague promises that her climate policy planks will ensure "that fossil fuel production taking place today is safe and responsible, that taxpayers get a fair deal for development on public lands, and that areas that are too sensitive for energy production are taken off the table." Until Clinton fills in the blanks on just what is "safe and responsible" and what isn't, the issue will remain a red flag for Team Green, particularly given Clinton's previous comments suggesting a much more moderate, let's-not-move-too-fast approach to issues of drilling and mining. "Hillary Clinton is half the way there," climate activist Bill McKibben said in a statement Monday that made it clear he and his allies will be watching for Clinton to weigh in on offshore drilling in the Arctic and coal mining in the Powder River Basin.

For now, though, Clinton has seized some much-needed momentum on an issue she's had problems with in the past. Not incidentally: Her clean energy proposal appears to pass the clean energy litmus test unveiled late last week by Tom Steyer, the billionaire environmentalist who is expected to spend tens of millions of dollars through his super PAC in the 2016 election.

How does Hillary's climate change plan compare to Martin O'Malley's? // CS Monitor // Gretel Kauffman – July 27, 2015

Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton revealed her initial plan for addressing climate change while campaigning in Iowa on Sunday, saying that those who don't acknowledge the issue are "just not paying attention."

"This is not complicated, folks," Ms. Clinton said, speaking to a crowd of more than 200 people at Iowa State University. "I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain. And I know we're facing a huge problem."

To tackle the problem, Clinton proposes, through tax incentives, to increase the amount of power derived from renewable sources such as wind and solar.

"We need to get the incentives fixed in our tax system which as you know are too heavily weighted toward fossil fuels," Clinton said.

The former Secretary of State also implied that her plans would impose changes on the coal industry. She credited coal mine workers for having "created an industrial revolution" and stated that "it is important that we help them transition to a new economy."

In a video released Sunday night, Clinton named two national goals that she will set if elected president. The first is to have more than half a billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of her first term. The second is that, within a decade, the United States will generate enough clean, renewable energy to power every home in within its borders.

"The decisions we make in the next decade can make all of this possible, or they can keep us trapped in the past," Clinton says in the video. "We cannot wait any longer."

Clinton plans to outline her plan in greater detail on Monday.

In response to Clinton's proposals, fellow 2016 Democratic contender Martin O'Malley called attention to his plan, which he says addresses not only consumer energy use, but also industry and transportation.

In Mr. O'Malley's plan, announced just over a month ago, the former Maryland governor said that "a moral obligation to future generations to act immediately and aggressively" required us to transition to a fully clean energy economy by 2050.

In his white paper, O'Malley argued that the transition to 100 percent clean energy is the biggest job-creation opportunity the country has seen in a century. He proposes creating a "Clean Energy Jobs Corps" which will work with local communities on energy-saving projects.

He criticized the "all-of-the-above" energy policy used by the White House, stating: "We can't meet the climate challenge with an all-of-the above energy strategy, or from drilling off our coasts, or from building pipelines that bring oil from tar sands in Canada."

O'Malley plans to seek a cap on carbon emissions from all fossil fuel sources, and use proceeds from federal permits to help lower- and middle-class families with job transition assistance. He also said that he would reject projects such as the Keystone XL pipeline.

During his two terms as governor of Maryland, O'Malley doubled Maryland's renewable fuel production, and reduced the state's greenhouse gases by 10 percent.

"The fact is, there is no either/or choice between our prosperity and protecting our planet — we can create a future where there are more jobs, and a future with a livable climate," O'Malley wrote in an op-ed for USA Today. "And there is no future for humankind without a livable climate."

Hillary Clinton has big plans for solar power. Are they achievable? // CS Monitor // David J. Unger – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton sees your plans for a clean-energy future and raises you a few hundred-million solar panels.

The Democratic presidential frontrunner rolled out an ambitious plan late Sunday to decarbonize the US power sector, the first of what her campaign says will be a series of energy and climate policy announcements.

Although light on details, Mrs. Clinton's plan sets high targets for renewable energy deployment and goes further than energy policies put in place by President Obama – the first occupant of the Oval Office to take direct executive action on climate change. The plan is an attempt to fend off critics from the left who say the former secretary of state has been slow make climate a part of her campaign. It also puts Clinton in stark contrast to Republican candidates, the majority of whom either avoid discussing mainstream climate science or dismiss it outright.

Recommended: Climate change: Is your opinion informed by science? Take our quiz!

"I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain, and I know what's happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter, and especially on my granddaughter," Clinton says in a video unveiling the climate plan. "It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change – who would rather remind us 'they're not scientists' than listen to those who are."

The US will install more than a billion solar panels by 2020, according to Clinton's plan, raising total installed capacity from today's 21 gigawatts to 140 gigawatts. That represents a 700 percent increase over four years. As Vox's Brad Plumer points out, that's a big number, but not entirely implausible. Between 2010 and 2014, solar capacity grew by 418 percent, according to the US Energy Information Administration.

The plan also calls for the US to generate enough renewables to power every US home by 2027. That equates roughly to generating a third of US electricity from wind, solar, and other renewable sources – up from 13 percent today. It also goes beyond the 25 percent of electricity generation from renewables that is projected to come with President Obama's proposed Clean Power Plan. That plan, which would regulate carbon emissions from US power plants for the first time in the nation's history, is being challenged in Congress and in court. If elected president, Clinton says she will defend the plan from its critics.

"The Clean Power Plan is a crucial tool in our national strategy to reduce carbon pollution, level the playing field for and increase the deployment of renewable energy, and build a clean energy future," the campaign's fact sheet reads. "But smart federal standards set the floor, not the ceiling. We can and must go further."

Deep-pocketed environmentalist donors are expected to play a large role in this election cycle. Billionaire investor and climate activist Tom Steyer has urged presidential candidates to adopt a target of generating half of US power from carbon-free sources by 2030. Clinton's plan would bring her platform in line with that target or potentially exceed it, assuming nuclear generation remains flat or even grows.

The plan is expected to cost around $60 billion, according to a campaign spokesman, to be offset by eliminating tax breaks for the oil and gas industry.

The question, then, is whether or not Clinton's vision is both technically feasible and politically viable. Most analysts suggest that a significant decarbonization of US energy supply over the coming decades would be challenging, but certainly within the realm of possibility. The technology for carbon-free power generation already exists – it's a matter of deploying those technologies and ensuring they work in harmony to create a stable grid.

Indeed, "it is technically feasible to achieve an 80% greenhouse gas reduction below 1990 levels by 2050 in the United States," according to a joint study released last fall by the consultancy Energy and Environmental

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Economics, Lawrence Berkeley National Lab, and Pacific Northwest National Laboratory. The study outlines several different pathways to meet that target that rely on different generation mixes and estimates the incremental cost of such an endeavor to be less than 1 percent of US GDP.

It's harder to say whether or not such a plan is politically viable. Cap-and-trade bills that would put a price on carbon have been largely a non-starter in Congress, and executive actions are vulnerable to legal and Congressional challenges. But there are some signs that public support for climate policies is growing, which could shift how presidential candidates view the issue. Forty-six percent of Americans say that global warming is a serious problem, according to a June survey by Pew Research Center. That's an increase of 13 percentage points from spring of 2013.

Hillary Clinton Still Won't Talk About Keystone // National Journal // Clare Foran – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton has started to roll out what her campaign calls an ambitious agenda to tackle the threat of global warming.

But she still refuses to take a stand on the controversial Keystone XL pipeline.

The pipeline, which has been under review by the administration for more than six years, has become a flashpoint in a contentious national debate over global warming and the future of American energy security. Environmentalists oppose the project and view Clinton's silence as frustrating and alarming.

At an event in Iowa on Monday, Clinton was asked by a reporter if she would take a position on the pipeline now that she has officially entered the race as a 2016 White House contender.

Clinton sidestepped the question by saying that the State Department review of the pipeline should be allowed to play out, suggesting that her tenure as secretary of State when the review began disqualified her from weighing in.

"I will refrain from commenting because I had a leading role in getting that process started and I think that we have to let it run its course," Clinton said, adding that she is confident that Keystone's impact on global warming will be "a major factor" in the administration's determination of whether or not the pipeline is in the national interest.

Since leaving the State Department, Clinton has repeatedly declined to say if she thinks the pipeline should be built. But now that her campaign has started to outline an official climate agenda, environmentalists are hoping that the 2016 Democratic front-runner will break her silence.

Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders, Clinton's Democratic opponents on the Left, both vocally oppose the construction of the pipeline. But weighing in on Keystone would put Clinton in a tough spot. Environmentalists protest the project but labor unions, a major source of Democratic backing, say that its construction would create jobs. For now, Clinton looks intent on keeping quiet.

The Clinton campaign outlined a series of first steps to ramp up renewable energy on Sunday evening and rolled out a video in which Clinton warned that action must be taken now to fight back against the problem of Earth's rapidly rising temperatures.

That announcement avoided any mention of the pipeline as well as other controversial issues, such as whether Clinton would support drilling off the Arctic coast.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bill McKibben, the founder of grassroots environmental group 350.org , called on Clinton to say what she thinks about Keystone on Monday before her remarks in Iowa.

"Now, we need Clinton to show she understands the other half of the climate-change equation—and prove she has the courage to stand up against fossil fuel projects like offshore and Arctic drilling, coal leasing in the Powder River basin, and the Keystone XL pipeline."

Clinton indicated that she would build on President Obama's use of executive action to fight climate change, but added that she believes she may also be able to convince Congress to work with her.

"We still have a lot [that we can do] without getting congressional support," Clinton said, adding: "Making this a central issue in my campaign, I hope, will give me the momentum to be able to go to the Congress and say look, cease fire. We need to make the transition, and we can do it and save money at the same time, and create millions of new jobs and businesses that will be to the benefit of our country.

"As president, I'll do everything I can to lead us toward that clean-energy future," Clinton said.

Here's How Hillary Clinton Wants to Fight Global Warming // National Journal // Ben Beman and Clare Foran - July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton began the closely watched rollout of her energy-and-climate platform Sunday evening by announcing goals that would greatly expand the deployment of renewable power in the coming years.

However, the announcement does not address a suite of controversial topics, including whether Clinton supports the Keystone XL pipeline and whether she would allow oil drilling in Arctic waters.

But the Clinton campaign emphasized that Sunday's proposal is just part of a broader climate-and-energy agenda that will unfold in the coming months.

Clinton's plan calls for more than half a billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of her first term, and having the U.S. generate enough renewable energy to power every home within a decade of the start of a Clinton presidency.

Achieving the goals would mean expanding the amount of installed solar-energy generating capacity by 700 percent from current levels by the end of 2020, and adding more green-power generation capacity to the electric grid than any other decade in U.S. history, according to a summary of the plan.

According to the Clinton campaign, the clean energy agenda outlined on Sunday would meet the test that environmental mega donor Tom Steyer laid out last week when he called on all candidates to put forward a plan to ramp up renewable and carbon-free energy so that it accounts for more than half of all power generation by 2030.

Brian Fallon, a Clinton campaign spokesman, said on Twitter: "Clinton's goal translates to 33% of electricity by 2027. Counting nuclear, as Steyer does, she exceeds his 50% goal."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Steyer was quick to praise Clinton while making clear that he hopes to see the 2016 Democratic frontrunner outline additional actions she will take to fight global warming.

"Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis," Steyer said in a statement, adding: "we look forward to hearing more details about her proposals to tackle climate change."

The campaign unveiled the clean-energy pledge by releasing a video and outline of the plan Sunday evening.

"Future generations will look back and wonder: What were we thinking? How could we possibly be so irresponsible?" Clinton's voice intones during the video. "I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain, and I know what's happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter and especially on my granddaughter."

"You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all; you just have to be willing to act," Clinton adds.

Sunday's rollout is a pivotal political moment in Clinton's relationship to environmentalists, including the more-progressive wing of the movement that has questioned her green bona fides.

Some environmentalists are dubious about Clinton's commitment to powerfully confronting global warming and fossil fuels. The more lefty and aggressive sectors of the green movement, such as Vermont activist Bill McKibben, note her lack of a Keystone position.

And Clinton has applauded the economic benefits of the nation's fracking-fueled oil and natural-gas boom, and the lower carbon emissions of gas compared to coal, while calling for "smart" regulations.

The summary of her plan does not touch on where she may seek to allow or bar development, promising only future information on the topic.

There will be a major initiative, the campaign said, on ways to "ensure that fossil fuel production taking place today is safe and responsible, that taxpayers get a fair deal for development on public lands, and that areas that are too sensitive for energy production are taken off the table."

Steps to achieve the renewable power goals announced on Sunday include protecting the Obama administration's carbon-emissions standards for power plants, according to the Clinton campaign, as well as new initiatives. That means, a "new partnership with states, cities, and rural communities that are ready to lead on clean energy." This work would include grants and "market-based" incentives to help states cut carbon beyond the standards Obama is imposing and accelerate green-energy deployment.

The campaign says Clinton, if elected, would pursue a wide-ranging set of initiatives to expand deployment of renewable energy, such as removing barriers to transmission and fighting to extend green energy tax credits on Capitol Hill, and expanding renewables development on federal lands and buildings, among other steps.

major themes of her race for the White House.

Subsequent announcements will address issues such as reducing oil consumption in the U.S. and around the world, guarding against supply disruptions, and modernizing energy infrastructure, the campaign said.

On the heels of Sunday night's announcement, Clinton will tour and give a speech on energy and climate Monday at the Des Moines Area Regional Transit Central Station, which has a "platinum" certification in the U.S. Green Building Council's rating system.

Two other contenders for the Democratic nod are appealing to progressive voters with aggressive climate proposals and records of their own.

Sen. Bernie Sanders, who has been gaining in the polls and attracting large crowds, has sponsored legislation to impose a tax on carbon emissions.

Sanders also is a longtime opponent of the Keystone XL pipeline and has endorsed the movement among some universities, churches, foundations, and other institutional investors to dump their holdings in coal and oil-and-gas companies.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, another Keystone foe, unveiled a broad plan in June. It proposes a mandate to require that all of the nation's electricity come from renewable sources by 2050, while expanding EPA's carbon emissions rules for power plants to cover other large pollution sources and rejecting any expansion of offshore drilling, among other measures.

O'Malley, saddled with very low polling numbers, sought to promote his plan ahead of Clinton's announcement Sunday.

"Eschewing the piecemeal, poll-tested, 'all of the above' energy strategies of the past, O'Malley has made clear that he will use the full force of his executive power to make the transition to a clean energy future the Number 1 priority of our federal government," his campaign said.

Clinton, in her Senate career before becoming secretary of State, drew high marks from the League of Conservation Voters, which carefully tracks lawmakers' votes on a suite of environmental and energy matters.

She scored an 82 percent record for her career, though her numbers were dragged down somewhat by missing a number of votes while running for president eight years ago.

Coal group slams Clinton energy plan as a 'dog and pony climate show' // The Hill // Devin Henry – July 27, 2015

A coal industry group slammed Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton’s climate change plan as a “dog and pony climate show” on Monday, indicating she could find as little support among fossil fuel interests as President Obama has during his term.

“We are disappointed Mrs. Clinton would continue the dog and pony climate show of the current administration instead of protecting the best interests of consumers and our economy,” said American Coalition for Clean Coal

Electricity spokeswoman Laura Sheehan.

“As a purported advocate of everyday Americans, Mrs. Clinton must look beyond political ideology and pursue an energy platform acknowledging the fundamental role coal-based electricity has and will play in keeping the lights on and allowing consumers to reach their full potential.”

Clinton released the first plank of her climate change platform on Sunday night, saying she would look to install 500 million solar panels by the end of her first term and ensure there is enough renewable energy to power all American homes within 10 years of taking office.

Her campaign said she will look to use tax incentives to expand renewable energy and preserve the Obama administration’s Clean Power Plan, a proposed rule that will look to cut carbon emissions at power plants.

Coal interests deeply oppose the rule, which could lead to fewer coal-fired power plants around the United States. Industry executives and labor groups alike have opposed the Obama administration’s climate agenda, worrying it will hurt the industry and raise energy prices.

“If Mrs. Clinton is serious about keeping Americans out of poverty and protecting our economy, she’ll pursue a commonsense energy platform that includes the role of affordable and reliable coal-based electricity,” Sheehan said.

In a fact sheet about her climate plan, the Clinton campaign said she would look to provide economic support to coal workers displaced by declining demand.

“Even as we face the threat of climate change head on, we cannot close our eyes to the challenges facing hard-working families in coal country, who kept our lights on and our factories running for more than a century,” she said at a Monday speech in Iowa.

“We should guarantee that coal miners and their families get the benefits they’ve earned and the respect they deserve.”

Clinton dodges Keystone question // The Hill // Timothy Cama – July 27, 2015

Presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton still won’t take a position on the controversial Keystone XL oil pipeline.

During an Iowa speech on climate change Monday, Clinton refused to weigh in on the project. She argued that because she served as President Obama's secretary of State when the pipeline was under consideration, it would be inappropriate for her to comment.

“No other presidential candidate was secretary of state when this process started, and I put together a very thorough, deliberative, evidence-based process to evaluate the environmental impact and other considerations of Keystone,” Clinton said at the Des Moines event.

“So I will refrain from commenting, because I had a leading role in getting that process started, and I think that we have to let it run its course,” she continued.

Clinton's comments are likely to further infuriate environmentalists, who have criticized her for years for avoiding the project’s controversy and declining to weigh in on oil drilling, hydraulic fracturing or other environmental measures.

Late Sunday, Clinton released the first piece of her climate platform, setting goals for solar power and renewable energy installation if she takes the White House.

Environmentalists applauded the goals as a good first step, but also say she should provide more detail on what she would do to tackle climate change.

For nearly seven years, the Obama administration has been taking various steps to evaluate TransCanada Corp.'s application to build the Keystone pipeline, which would run from Alberta, Canada to the Gulf Coast.

Since the pipeline would cross the Canadian border, Clinton took a leading role in the evaluation up until 2013, a role Secretary of State John Kerry is now responsible for.

She used the Monday speech to talk further about her climate plan, saying, "America needs to lead this fight, not go MIA."

Clinton also said she would roll back tax incentives that help the oil industry and use them to help clean energy industries.

But she dodged a question on whether she would seek to impose a tax on carbon dioxide emissions, saying she would outline later how she'd propose to pay for the expansion of renewable energy sources.

Clinton sets climate, renewable power goals // The Hill // Timothy Cama – July 26, 2015

Presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton late Sunday unveiled a set of goals to expand the use of renewable energy and solar power specifically as part of an effort to fight climate change.

As president, Clinton would try to reach a level of 500 million solar panels installed throughout the country, an eightfold increase over the current capacity, by the end of her first term in January 2021.

She would also aim to expand renewable power sources to the level that they could provide enough electricity for every United States home by 2027, 10 years after she would take office.

Clinton pledged to outline more about her energy and climate platform in the coming months.

Those goals, along with a video posted late Sunday, should start to answer frustrated environmentalists, who have been calling for Clinton to take a stand on various green issues since long before she declared her candidacy for president in April.

In the video, Clinton called the goals "ambitious" and took an opportunity to criticize her Republican opponents.

"Future generations will look back and wonder 'what were we thinking? How could we possibly be so irresponsible,' " Clinton says in the video.

“It’s hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change, who would rather remind us they’re not scientists than listen to those who are,” she says, referring indirectly to presidential hopefuls, such as Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), who have declared themselves not to be scientists.

“You don’t have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all,” Clinton says. “You just have to be willing to act.”

Clinton also promised Sunday to defend President Obama’s landmark carbon dioxide limits for power plants, along with other smaller actions.

Greens have started to rally around Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) as the Democratic nominee, citing his leadership role on many of their priorities, such as opposing the Keystone XL pipeline, a project on which Clinton has still not taken a position.

In addition to Keystone, Sunday’s announcement doesn’t confront Clinton’s past positions on oil drilling or hydraulic fracturing, which have been among greens’ top gripes with her.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley (D) has also been in front of Clinton on climate, saying in June that he would push for all of the country’s electricity to come from renewable sources by 2050.

It’s unclear if Clinton’s goals would align with the demands of billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer, who has pledged to donate only to candidates whose climate platforms would lead to half of the country’s electricity coming from renewables by 2030.

Hillary Clinton outlines climate change plan // Washington Examiner // Zack Colman – July 17, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton laid out a climate plan Sunday that aim to get half of all electricity generated in the United States from zero-carbon sources within 10 years.

Under the plan, Clinton said one-third of power a decade after taking the White House — were she to win the presidency — would come from renewable sources, enough to power every U.S. home. Once combined with existing nuclear power, which doesn't emit carbon, more than half of the nation's electricity would come from zero-emitting sources.

The strategy comes on the heels of pressure from Democratic rivals seeking the White House bid who have darted to the ex-secretary of state's left on climate change. It also comes after billionaire climate activist Tom Steyer prodded candidates Friday to offer detailed plans to get at least half of the nation's power from energy sources that don't emit greenhouse gases.

Shooting for that 50 percent mark underscores the Steyer's rising profile in the Democratic politics along with how central climate change has become for the party as a potential wedge issue with Republicans — only one GOP candidate so far has endorsed scientists' findings that humans are largely the cause of a warming planet.

"Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis and ensuring our country's economic security. Clinton laid out an ambitious framework to put our nation on a path to a clean energy economy that will create millions of jobs — and in the coming months we look forward to hearing more details about her proposals to tackle climate change," Steyer said in a statement through his super PAC, NextGen Climate Action.

Steyer already has hosted a fundraiser for Clinton. He hasn't yet said publicly how much he wants to spend in 2016, though it's expected to surpass the $57 million Steyer spent on the 2014 election. Meanwhile, Sen. Bernie Sanders, I-Vt., and ex-Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley have competed for a slice of the liberal environmental base that was a key voting bloc for President Obama in part by touting climate and energy policies sought by the Democratic Party's progressive wing.

Progressives have continued to press Clinton for more details about her climate strategy and have been wary of her credentials, citing her resistance to comment on whether she'd OK the Keystone XL oil sands pipeline. Clinton has said she doesn't think it would be proper to comment on the Canada-to-Texas project because she presided over its application while at Foggy Bottom.

Clinton's team said she would "make it a top priority to fight efforts to roll back the Clean Power Plan," the signature Obama administration climate regulation that's due to be finalized this summer. A growing number of states have signaled they won't comply with the regulation, which seeks to limit carbon emissions from power plants, and it's been in congressional Republican crosshairs for months.

The Clinton campaign also said it would prioritize investment in electric transmission infrastructure, push to extend clean energy tax credits while making them "more cost effective," and try to link up half a billion homes with solar power by the end of a prospective first term, increasing total solar capacity by 700 percent, up to 140 gigawatts.

The strategy also calls for increasing renewable energy production on federal land and expanding clean energy investment in rural communities.

Clinton also looked to shore up support from the Democratic Party's centrists by saying any climate push should include a plan for ensuring coal communities don't fall by the wayside — a plan for which the campaign said would come at a later date. Much of the opposition to Obama's climate agenda comes from coal-heavy states, as they say regulations will put people out of business.

Other parts of Clinton's energy platform will be coming in the ensuing month, her team said. Plans for updating energy infrastructure, reducing global oil consumption and for pursuing "safe and responsible production" of fossil fuels are on the docket.

Hillary Clinton talks big on climate change but silent on Keystone XL // Washington Times // S.A. Miller – July 27, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton’s move to cozy up to the party’s environmentalists came up short Monday when she again refused to take a position on the proposed Keystone XL oil pipeline.

Mrs. Clinton said that she couldn’t offer an opinion because she helped establish the approval process for the controversial cross-country pipeline when she was President Obama’s secretary of state.

“No other presidential candidate was secretary of state when this process started, and I put together a very thorough, deliberative, evidence-based process to evaluate the environmental impact and other considerations of Keystone,” Mrs. Clinton said at an event in Des Moines, Iowa, where she outlined her plan to fight climate change.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I will refrain from commenting, because I had a leading role in getting that process started, and I think that we have to let it run its course,” she said.

U.S. approval of the pipeline has been stymied since Mr. Obama took office.

Environmentalists fiercely oppose the Keystone XL pipeline, which would run from Canada to Nebraska and hook up with existing pipelines to the Gulf Coast, and have made opposition to it a litmus test for Democratic presidential candidates.

Mrs. Clinton had already come under fire for rolling out a climate change agenda that featured ambitious goals to “decarbonize” America but lacked details about how she would accomplish it.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley, who is waging a long-shot bid for Democratic presidential nomination, pounced on Mrs. Clinton.

“Governor O’Malley is opposed to the Keystone XL pipeline because we can’t move to a clean energy future if we continue to rely on dirty, short-term fossil fuel fixes,” said O’Malley campaign manager Lis Smith. “Real leadership is about forging public opinion on issues like Keystone — not following it. Every Democrat should follow his lead and take a stand to commit to ending our reliance on fossil fuels.”

Hillary Clinton’s climate change goals include plan to ‘decarbonize’ America // Washington Times // S.A. Miller - July 26, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton entered the climate change debate Sunday, setting ambitious goals to “decarbonize” America and blasting her Republican rivals for ignoring scientists who warn of a looming disaster from global warming.

Mrs. Clinton announced what she described as the first pillars of a comprehensive energy and climate agenda with a three-minute Web video that presented a montage of scenes of children on playgrounds, farmland and windmills juxtaposed with footage of wildfires, a blazing sun and flood damage.

“I’m just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain, and I know what’s happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter and especially on my granddaughter,” Mrs. Clinton said in her narration for the video.

Mrs. Clinton promised that, if elected president, she would set two goals to fight climate change: increase the number of solar panels by more than 500 million across the country by the end of her first term and set a 10-year goal of generating enough renewable energy to power every single home in America.

Mrs. Clinton’s goals served as her opening bid to satisfy the Democratic Party’s liberal base, which wants a more aggressive effort on climate change and environmentalism than President Obama has been able to muster.

Mrs. Clinton’s liberal opponents for the nomination, most significantly Sen. Bernard Sanders of Vermont, already have staked out tough stances and made the issue a centerpiece of their campaigns.

The campaign manager for Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley responded with a memorandum that did not name Mrs. Clinton but highlighted the former Maryland governor’s long-standing plan to combat climate change and make the country 100 percent powered by renewable energy by 2050.

The memo stressed that the climate change issue needed “actions, not just words,” and referenced Mr. O'Malley’s longtime opposition to the Keystone XL cross-country oil pipeline, which is the bane of environmentalists. Mrs. Clinton has not taken a public stand on the pipeline.

Mr. O'Malley has forcefully challenged Mrs. Clinton from the left on a host of issues but has failed to gain traction in the polls, slipping further into the single digits as Mr. Sanders, a self-identified socialist, has gained steam with his own agenda.

The Clinton campaign said the former first lady, senator and secretary of state would discuss more of her plan to increase renewable energy sources and address climate change Monday after a tour at the green-energy certified Des Moines Area Regional Transit (DART) Central Station in Iowa.

To achieve her goals on climate change, Mrs. Clinton would launch a “clean energy challenge” that forms a partnership with states, cities and rural communities that are ready to lead on clean energy, according to the campaign.

The challenge will include:

• Competitive grants and other market-based incentives to empower states to enact carbon pollution standards tougher than the federal government’s and accelerate clean energy deployment.

• Awards for communities that successfully cut the red tape that slows rooftop solar installation times and increases costs for businesses and consumers.

• Work with states, cities and rural communities to strengthen grid reliability and resilience, increase consumer choice and improve customer value.

• Expand the Rural Utilities Service and other successful USDA programs to help provide clean, reliable, and affordable energy, not just to rural Americans but to the rest of the country as well.

The campaign said Mrs. Clinton also would fight efforts to roll back the Clean Power Plan, a proposed rule by the Environmental Protection Agency that would cut carbon emissions from power plants and is being challenged in court.

In the video, Mrs. Clinton called out eight Republican presidential candidates for either denying climate change or claiming they couldn’t judge whether climate change exists because they are not scientists.

The screen was filled with the text of quotes from former Sen. Rick Santorum, Sen. Rand Paul, Sen. Marco Rubio, real estate mogul Donald Trump, former Gov. Jeb Bush, former Gov. Rick Perry, Sen. Ted Cruz and Gov. John Kasich.

“It’s hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change. Who would rather remind us they’re not scientists than listen to those who are,” Mrs. Clinton said. “You don’t have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all; you just have to be willing to act.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton said Republicans were stuck in the past and she was offering leadership for the future and the opportunity to make America a “clean energy superpower,” which is a phrase she has used repeatedly on the campaign trail.

“We’re on the cusp of a new era. We can have more choice in the energy we consume and produce. We can create a more open, efficient and resilient grid that connects us, empowers us — improves our health and benefits us all,” she said in the video. “The decisions we make in the next decade can make all of this possible, or they can keep us trapped in the past. We cannot wait any longer. It’s time we stand for a healthier climate, stand for cleaner air, for science, innovation, for our children, for reality, for the future.”

Hillary Clinton's climate change policy pitch: install half a billion solar panels // Guardian // Suzanne Goldenberg – July 27, 2015

Barack Obama ran for president promising to save the planet. Hillary Clinton is promising to help people save money on their electricity bills.

In the first big reveal of her climate change policy, Clinton said she would install half a billion new solar panels by the end of her first term in the White House, and generate enough renewable energy to power every home in the country 10 years after her inauguration.

“Not some homes. Not most homes. Every home in America,” she said in a speech on Monday at the main bus terminal in Des Moines.

The Democratic frontrunner for the 2016 presidential nomination cast climate change as one of the most urgent threats of our time – but she was also careful to raise the prospect of freeing Americans from their monthly utility bills as part of the solution.

“I personally believe climate change is a challenge of such magnitude and urgency that we need a president who will set ambitious goals,” Clinton told reporters.

The first such goal articulated by Clinton, set out in a video posted on her campaign website on Sunday night, called for installing half a billion new solar panels in her first term. Clinton set a target of generating 33% of America’s electricity from renewable sources, a more ambitious target than Obama.

But Clinton declined to stake out her position on the big decisions confronting the next president on climate change: Arctic drilling, fracking, oil and gas exports, and the hot button issue for Obama and Clinton, during her time as secretary of state: the future of the Keystone XL tar sands pipeline.

Clinton’s earlier position on Keystone – she said five years ago she was inclined to approve the project – has made her a target of environmental campaigners. She was heckled at an event in New Hampshire earlier this month when she refused to endorse a ban on oil and gas drilling on public lands “until we get alternatives in place”.

She managed to win over some campaigners on Monday, but only somewhat, and she was rebuked by the country’s main coal lobby.

Michael Brune, the Sierra Club’s executive director, said he was “thrilled” with Clinton’s renewable electricity goal, and her promise to defend Obama's clean power plan.

But Bill McKibeen, the founder of the 350.org campaign group, said: "Hillary Clinton is half the way there." McKibben said Clinton had made a "credible commitment" to renewable energy, but she could not dodge the difficult decisions ahead on Arctic drilling and coal extraction – let alone the Keystone pipeline . "At the end of the day, growth in renewables doesn't mean enough if we're simultaneously kicking the decarbonization can down the road with more pipelines and more extraction on public lands," McKibben said.

Clinton's reticence did not spare her criticism from the main coal lobby, Americans for Clean Coal Electricity, which said it was disappointed she "would continue the dog and pony climate show of the current administration".

Other campaigners noted Clinton's failure to spell out how she would defend Obama's clean power plant rules – the pillar of his climate change plan – from attacks by Congress and the courts.

She was unclear about how she would would pay for her ambitious climate plan – given a Republican-controlled Congress that has been hostile to funding requests for energy and research.

"A lot of these changes will pay for themselves. There will be front end money needed," she told reporters. "But there are ways of making those investments and getting a big return on those investment that will be to the benefit of the American taxpayer."

But Clinton's first big moment on the environment showed a candidate determined to couch climate change in the populist economic rhetoric of her campaign.

Obama, on the campaign trail, promised to save a "planet in peril", and in the White House proposed climate measures that would save the equivalent in carbon pollution of shuttering multiple coal plants or taking millions of cars off the road.

Clinton in contrast said her plan would result in the equivalent of rooftop solar on 25 million American homes – which was a more populist approach, said Paul Bledsoe, who headed the White House climate change taskforce under Bill Clinton.

"There is a subtle message in here that her renewable energy plan will help consumers break free of utilities while helping to deal with climate change," said Bledsoe. "It is explicitly framed in populist language."

Rooftop solar grew by 76% last year a wave propelled by the plummeting prices of panels and government policy.

However, those pricing policies are under a sustained attack by some two dozen front groups and utility companies operating in 27 states, according to the Energy and Policy Institute.

Hillary Clinton's Solar Pledge: 'Ambitious but Realistic' // US News // Alan Neuhauser – July 27, 2015

A potential center of the U.S. political solar system plans to harness the sun.

Hillary Clinton, former secretary of state and 2016 Democratic presidential hopeful, pledged Sunday to install more than 500 million solar panels by the end of her first term and to generate enough renewable energy to power every American home within 10 years of taking office.

The plan, which experts call “ambitious but realistic,” would increase the country’s solar capacity by 700 percent by 2020, potentially allowing the nation to draw a third of its electricity from renewable sources by 2027.

It is the first in a series of expected announcements on energy and climate change this week, according to the Clinton campaign.

"We’re on the cusp of a new era,” Clinton said in a statement on her campaign website announcing the pledge. “We can create a more open, efficient, and resilient grid that connects us, empowers us, improves our health, and benefits us all."

Solar provided less than 1 percent of the electricity generated in the U.S. last year, but its growth has been nothing short of explosive, powered both by falling prices and federal tax incentives. Since 2013, solar markets have expanded by about 36 percent a year. Clinton’s plan would push that up to about 42 percent.

“It’s a lot: The U.S. would have to install about 2.5 times as much solar during her first term as it has in all of its history before that. So that’s a ton of growth,” says Shayle Kann, senior vice president at GTM Research. “That said, the growth rate is more or less in line with what we’re seeing now.”

While solar has dropped in price, and financing vehicles from companies like Solar City allow homeowners to install panels without spending any money upfront, Clinton’s plan ultimately hinges on tax credits and subsidies – one of which, an investment credit for buying and installing solar panels, is set to expire in 2016.

“That’s the biggest challenge,” Kann says. “In Congress, getting anything passed is hard these days. Because the default scenario is expiration, that’s a big lift.”

Republicans, meanwhile, were quick to criticize the approach.

“Hillary Clinton’s energy ‘plan’ is to raise more taxes and double down on President Obama’s EPA overreach, which held down wages and cost American jobs,” Republican National Committee spokesman Michael Short said in a statement.

Trade and advocacy groups representing the coal, oil and natural gas sectors – some of the biggest donors in U.S. politics, and traditionally larger contributors to Republican candidates – have rejected or even undermined climate change research. Only one GOP candidate, for example, Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, has acknowledged the existence of human-induced global warming, a fact overwhelmingly supported by science.

Clinton’s Sunday announcement, however, likely will not alienate potential industry donors, experts say – at least during the primary as she faces challenges from more liberal candidates such as former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley and Vermont independent Sen. Bernie Sanders.

“This is clearly not going to hurt her with those groups in securing the Democratic nomination, because anything she might say is going to be outflanked by a Sanders or an O’Malley,” says Barry Rabe, a professor at the Gerald R. Ford School of Public Policy at the University of Michigan. “I don’t know that there’s going to be a huge outcry over this.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The announcement doesn't exactly rival in ambition President John F. Kennedy's pledge in 1961 to put a man on the moon by the end of the decade. But, Kann, says, "it's a good campaign target. It's ambitious, but it's not outside the realm of possibility."

Why Hillary Clinton could be the solar industry's new best friend // Fortune // Katie Fehrenbacher – July 27, 2015

The presidential candidate is calling for huge growth in the solar sector, and that would require some big federal help.

Presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton released an ambitious plan to boost U.S. clean energy and fight climate change. The vision, which also lacked details, called for more than a half billion solar panels, or about 140 gigawatts of solar, to be installed in the U.S. by 2020, and enough clean energy to power all homes by 2027.

But to deliver on her big goals, a federal government under her watch would have to maintain and implement a variety of clean power initiatives that are far from certain. She'd have to extend an important solar tax incentive that is set to shrink the year she would take office, and she'd have to aggressively fight for Obama's highly controversial Clean Power Plan that would cut carbon emissions from power plants.

If she accomplishes these goals she could end up being a massive ally to the solar industry in the U.S. Without these federal policies, the solar sector faces closer growth because the government incentives that have helped to fuel a portion of its rapid growth in recent years are starting to be phased out.

Let's look at the numbers behind Clinton's clean energy plan.

Clinton calls for 140 gigawatts worth of solar panels in the U.S. by 2020, which is a seven-fold increase from the current 21.12 gigawatts, according to data from GTM Research. A gigawatt is about the equivalent energy of a large natural gas plant.

GTM Research analysts predict that with current U.S. policies, there would be just over a three-fold increase to 70 gigawatts of solar panels installed by 2020. That's about half of what Clinton is calling for.

What makes up the difference? One of the main ones is uncertainty around what will happen with the investment tax credit, or the ITC, which delivers a 30% federal tax credit to solar project developers. Bloomberg analyst Jacqueline Lilinshtein describes federal policies like solar tax credits as "the single most important drivers of growth over the past few years."

But the problem is that the federal tax credit is set to decline at the end of 2016, and Clinton would take office at the beginning of 2017. At that point the tax credit is supposed to ramp down to a 10% tax credit.

Many in the solar industry assume that the tax credit will not be renewed, although it has been in the past. The industry's increasing maturity makes congress less likely to intervene with a gradual reduction that has been planned for years.

Will Clinton make it a priority to extend the solar tax break? Well, because she would only take office after it's already expired, she would have to rally congress to re-instate it. In her release she says part of her clean energy plan includes:

"Tax Incentives: Fight to extend federal clean energy incentives and make them more cost effective both for taxpayers and clean energy producers."

The CEO of big home solar installer SolarCity, Lyndon Rive, said in an interview that Hillary Clinton is "a leader that understands we have to change." While he's operating his business on the assumption that the tax break will not be extended, he said "it'll be a shame," and "bad policy" if it's phased out.

Rive argued that the fossil fuel industry should be taxed rather than getting a number of breaks, as is the current reality. Polluters should be taxed, he said, while industries that aren't should get benefits.

Beyond the solar tax incentives, there's the Clean Power Plan, the Obama administration's proposal to use the Environmental Protection Agency to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from the power industry under the Clean Air Act. In essence the EPA, which will be finalizing the rules for the plan later this summer, would regulate carbon emissions the way it does air pollution.

Electric power generation from coal and natural gas plants is responsible for 40% of U.S. carbon emissions. Under the Clean Power Plan, states would have flexibility in how they meet carbon reduction goals. States with large coal industries might want to focus on capturing carbon emissions from the plants. Meanwhile, states with ample sunshine might want to encourage solar industries to set up shop and grow.

But the Clean Power Plan is highly controversial. Critics say it unfairly targets coal industry states and will mean higher energy bills for consumers.

Clinton says in a release that she will make it "a top priority" to fight the efforts to roll back the Clean Power Plan. She calls it a "crucial tool" in the nation's strategy to curb carbon emissions.

While the federal government is a primary driver of clean energy in the U.S., solar is a highly regional industry. California and the U.S. Southwest are the biggest markets in part because of strong state and local incentives.

To help state and local clean energy plans, Clinton says she will establish a "Clean Energy Challenge," which will create better partnerships between the federal governments and states and cities.

Beyond any policies, the U.S. solar industry has grown rapidly in recent years thanks to the dropping costs of solar panels and installation. Bloomberg's Lilinshtein describes solar as having "moved from a niche product to the mainstream" and says that federal subsidies won't necessarily be required in the industry to maintain strong growth.

But delivering the huge growth that Clinton is calling for will likely need these federal subsidies.

Analysts and solar industry execs agree, though, Clinton's numbers aren't all that crazy if helped by strong federal support. SolarCity's Rive says that the plan is "is absolutely achievable." Lilinshtein describes it as "an aggressive target but certainly in the realm of possibility." GTM Research analyst Shayle Kann explains it as "a perfect target: ambitious but possible."

Hillary Clinton just released this bizarre video bashing 'mad scientist' GOP candidates on climate change // Business Insider // Colin Campbell – July 27, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign found a creative way to highlight how her position on climate change contrasts with the GOP field.

Clinton's team released a video on Monday that is reminiscent of old movies like "Frankenstein," featuring clips of Republican candidates questioning the science of climate change.

The video pokes fun at Republicans who, in response to questions about global warming, say that they're not scientists.

"REPUBLICANS REPEAT ONE CHILLING PHRASE," the video declares amid faux-scary music. "FEEL THE TERROR AS THEY DENY ESTABLISHED SCIENCE. ... AND THE SCARIEST PART? ONE OF THESE MAD (NOT A) SCIENTISTS COULD BE PRESIDENT!"

The Republicans included in the ad were former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R), Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Florida), former Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R), Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R), former Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pennsylvania), Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), former Hewlett Packard Carly Fiorina, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal (R), and real-estate mogul Donald Trump.

In the video, some of the GOP candidates directly expressed doubt that global warming is a human-caused crisis, while others simply said the US alone can't solve the problem.

Clinton gave a speech earlier in the day declaring that climate change is one of the most "urgent threats of our time." She also pledged have more than half a billion solar panels across the country installed by the end of her first term as president.

Enough renewables to power “every home in America”: Hillary Clinton goes big on green energy // Salon // Lindsay Abrams – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton is not a scientist. She is, as she explains in a new campaign video, “a grandmother with two eyes and a brain” — and, we could add, a need to prove she’s able to lead on climate change.

Sunday evening, the Democratic presidential candidate offered an early indication of how she intends to do that: with a major, ten-year push to boost renewable energy.

On her first day as President, Clinton promised, she’d set two ambitious goals for the U.S.: one, to install more than half a billion solar panels, across the country, by the end of her first term; and two, to be generating enough renewable energy to power every home in America in just ten years’ time.

The goals, as stated, can certainly be characterized as ambitious. Clinton’s vision for solar panels, according to the campaign, would represent a 700 percent increase in solar capacity from its current levels, or the equivalent of adding solar panels to 25 million American homes. And the renewables push she describes, involving a combination of wind, solar, hydro, geothermal and “other forms of renewable energy” would require adding more power capacity to the grid by 2027 than has been accomplished in any previous decade — and would represent a big leap forward from President Obama’s plan of tripling renewable energy production, to 20 percent, by 2030.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's yet to come forward with many details for what she's calling her "Clean Energy Challenge." But to begin with, she's doubling down on her support for the EPA's power plant rule, the final version of which is expected to be released soon, and says she's committed to protecting it from "attacks from climate change deniers." She also intends to bolster the green energy industry through the expansion of tax incentives.

The unveiled plan did go relatively easy on the fossil fuel industry: Clinton pledged to "ensure that fossil fuel production taking place today is safe and responsible" and that "areas that are too sensitive for energy production are taken off the table," although she didn't comment specifically on hot button issues like offshore and Arctic drilling, both of which Obama has permitted, and which Democratic primary contenders Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley have vocally opposed. And she's — still — yet to take a stance on the Keystone XL pipeline, which more than anything else would stand as a symbolic indicator of her intent to go all-in on climate action.

But on the climate denial front, she's got the rhetoric down pat. "It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change, who would rather remind us they're not scientists than listen to those who are," she says in the video. "You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all. You just have to be willing to act."

Hillary Clinton Just Released Her First Major Climate Change Proposals // Mic // Zeeshan Aleem – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton has released the first two major policy proposals for her vision for tackling climate change and ensuring the United States' primacy as the "world's clean energy superpower."

The plan, which she announced through a video released on Sunday, sets forth two enterprising goals. Her first commitment is a pledge to have more than half a billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of her first term in office. Her second objective is to power every home in the U.S. with clean renewable energy within a decade of her arrival in the White House.

The Clinton campaign also outlines her plan to form a "Clean Energy Challenge" that would create a network of partnerships between the federal government and states, cities and smaller communities to incentivize investment in renewable energy with grants.

The proposals are only the first of a number of climate policy commitments expected to emerge from Clinton's campaign in the coming months, but already some progressive outfits have responded with cautious optimism to her opening rhetoric.

The plan: Clinton's solar panel agenda would boost the amount of installed solar capacity by 700% by 2020 — the same as "rooftop solar systems on over 25 million homes," according to the campaign.

Her commitment to increasing the amount of renewable energy in the U.S. would double the share of renewables in overall power generation. Currently, renewable energy accounts for about 16% of total power generation in the country; Clinton's 10-year plan would increase that to 33% by 2027. Clinton's camp points out that that's eight percentage points higher than called for under the Obama administration's forthcoming "Clean Power Plan."

In her video announcing the proposals, Clinton takes aim at Republicans who deny climate change and singles out Jeb Bush's comment saying "I'm not a scientist" before describing himself a "skeptic" of global warming.

"It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change — who would rather remind us they're not scientists than listen to those who are," Clinton says in the video. "You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all, you just have to be willing to act."

The reaction: Clinton's message was received fairly well by a number of players in the climate policy field.

Tom Steyer, the head of NextGen Climate, offered vague but warm encouragement on Clinton's ideas in a statement issued by the Clinton campaign: "Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis and ensuring our country's economic security. Clinton laid out an ambitious framework to put our nation on a path to a clean energy economy that will create millions of jobs."

Steyer's opinion carries weight for Democratic candidates: His support is accompanied by vast amounts of cash. Steyer is a former hedge fund manager and was the single biggest public spender in the 2014 elections. According to the New York Times, in order to win the backing of his super PAC, a candidate "must pledge to enact an energy policy that would lead to the generation of half the nation's electricity from renewable or zero-carbon sources by 2030... and 100% from clean sources by 2050." When combined with nuclear energy, Clinton's 10-year plan for growing renewable energy more than meets Steyer's 2030 benchmark, as Clinton press secretary Brian Fallon pointed out on Twitter:

Some other climate policy groups praised Clinton's stance on renewable energy, but emphasized that she has yet to prove her mettle on combating fossil fuels.

"Clinton is half the way there — this is a credible commitment to renewable energy, and a recognition that the economics of electricity are changing fast," 350.org co-founder and climate change activist Bill McKibben said in a statement emailed to Mic. "Now, we need Clinton to show she understands the other half of the climate change equation — and prove she has the courage to stand up against fossil fuel projects like offshore and Arctic drilling, coal leasing in the Powder River basin, and the Keystone XL pipeline. Because at the end of the day, growth in renewables doesn't mean enough if we're simultaneously kicking the decarbonization can down the road with more pipelines and more extraction on public lands."

In the past, Clinton has angered green activists with her work on a variety of climate-related issues. But this time around, it seems like her campaign is off to a decent start on the issue.

In climate change plan, Hillary Clinton makes big bet on solar power // Mashable // Andrew Freedman – July 27, 2015

In a speech in Iowa on Monday, Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton began laying out what she says will be a forward-thinking, "ambitious" set of policy proposals and goals to address the threat of manmade global warming.

She does so as she faces a primary challenge from Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, who both have progressive records on global warming.

Clinton declared two goals, both of which involve a significant ramp up of renewable energy use in the U.S. The first goal is for the country to have "more than half a billion solar panels" installed in the U.S. by the end of Clinton's first term in office, which would be in 2020.

The second goal also centers on solar power, which has been expanding rapidly in recent years as the cost of manufacturing and installing solar panels has plummeted.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton said she wants the U.S. to generate enough renewable electricity to power every single home in the country within a decade.

These goals, which were first announced on Clinton's campaign website on Sunday night, would involve a 700% increase in installed solar capacity, which is equal to having rooftop solar systems on more than 25 million homes, the Clinton campaign stated in a fact sheet.

The policy proposals, the campaign stated, would put the country on a "deep emission reduction" pathway by the year 2050.

“The reality of climate change is unforgiving no matter what the deniers say,” Clinton said during an appearance at an environmentally-friendly transit station in Des Moines.

Since declaring their candidacy, none of the Republican presidential candidates have voiced support for the scientific consensus on climate change, which is that the world's climate is warming mainly due to manmade emissions of greenhouse gases. Scientists say that this year, in fact, is likely to be the warmest on record.

Clinton pledged to defend President Obama's EPA climate regulations, known as the Clean Power Plan, which is the central component of the current administration's goal of cutting global warming pollutants, such as carbon dioxide, to 26 to 28% below 2005 levels by 2025.

That regulations are under attack in the courts and on Capitol Hill.

“I will defend President Obama’s Clean Power Plan,” she said. “I refuse to let those who are deniers ... to rip away all that we’ve managed to do,” she said.

Clinton also said she would reduce economic incentives, such as tax breaks, for oil production and "extend incentives instead for clean energy."

As secretary of state, Clinton helped lead America's climate negotiations at the Copenhagen Summit in 2009, which failed to produce an ambitious agreement that contained binding emissions reductions worldwide. Many climate activists considered that summit to be a bitter disappointment.

Still, Clinton touts the non-binding Copenhagen Accord as a diplomatic accomplishment on her website.

The Accord, which was the first time that developing nations such as China agreed to take action to reduce their emissions, paved the way for a new climate treaty to be negotiated in Paris this year.

Clinton's record at those climate talks may come back to haunt the U.S. in Paris, however.

In Copenhagen, it was Clinton who rolled out a $100 billion per year Green Climate Fund to help fund emissions reduction efforts and climate adaptation work in developing countries.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That fund has not yet been fully capitalized, however, and this is a major sticking point as the international community approaches the next crucial round of U.N. climate talks, set for Paris in early December. Many developing countries say that without a working Green Climate Fund, they cannot take potentially painful emissions cuts at home.

In Iowa on Monday, Clinton said the U.S. must lead by example in order to secure climate agreements with other nations. “No country will fall in line just because we tell them to,” she said.

“America needs to lead this fight, not go M.I.A.,” Clinton said.

Clinton has earned the backing of billionaire Tom Steyer, whose group, NextGen Climate Action and a related political action committee, supports candidates who seek to address global warming. Steyer sent an email to reporters lauding Clinton's proposal on Sunday night.

"Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis and ensuring our country’s economic security," Steyer said in a statement. "Clinton laid out an ambitious framework to put our nation on a path to a clean energy economy that will create millions of jobs — and in the coming months we look forward to hearing more details about her proposals to tackle climate change."

Clinton dodges Keystone question

On the question of whether or not to approve the Keystone-XL Pipeline from Canada to the U.S., however, Clinton refused to take a position when asked about her stance by a reporter on Monday.

The pipeline would move oil from Canada's oil sands region in Alberta south to refineries along the Gulf Coast, where it would be prepared for export.

In dodging the Keystone issue, Clinton cited her involvement in the review process for the pipeline during her time at the State Department. Secretary of State John Kerry and President Obama have yet to make a decision on whether to approve the pipeline, which falls under the State Department's purview since it would cross an international border.

Clinton said she is confident that “The pipeline’s impacts on global greenhouse gas emissions will be a major factor in that decision."

Bill McKibben, the founder of the environmental group 350.org , lauded Clinton's policy proposals on Monday, but criticized her position on Keystone.

"Now, we need Clinton to show she understands the other half of the climate change equation — and prove she has the courage to stand up against fossil fuel projects like offshore and Arctic drilling, coal leasing in the Powder River basin, and the Keystone XL pipeline," he said in a statement.

"... At the end of the day, growth in renewables doesn’t mean enough if we’re simultaneously kicking the decarbonization can down the road with more pipelines and more extraction on public lands,” McKibben said.

Hillary Clinton's Climate Change Video Finally Calls Out Republicans' Bogus "I'm Not A Scientist" Platform //

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bustle // Lauren Barbato – July 27, 2015

For the next leg of her campaign, Hillary Clinton is taking on climate change. In a video released by her campaign Sunday night, Clinton unveiled her official climate-change position, as well as the policies she intends to put in place if she reaches the White House. So, what is her position on this major 2016 talking point? Well, let's just say Clinton's stance on the validity of science places her more in line with Pope Francis than Jeb Bush.

"I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain," Clinton says in the opening lines of the video. "I know what's happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter, and especially on my granddaughter."

Clinton goes on to attack her Republican foes, including frontrunners like Bush, Donald Trump, Rick Perry and Sen. Marco Rubio, for rejecting climate-change science — or, just science in general — in 2015. More and more, taking a stance against climate change has become a hallmark of the Republican Party, and Clinton wants to make sure none of us forgets it.

"It's hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change," Clinton says. "Who would rather remind us they're not scientists than listen to those who are."

"You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all," Clinton continues."You just have to be willing to act."

So, what is HRC going to do about this climate-change threat? First, she praised the renewable energy industry for preventing premature deaths and asthma attacks, while also creating new jobs for Americans.

But Clinton also put forth a much stronger call to action in her latest video. "On day one as president, I will set two ambitious national goals that will test our capacities," Clinton said.

And her two goals are (drumroll, please):

- ensuring America has more than half a billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of 2020
- set a 10-year goal of generating renewable energy that can power "every single home" in the United States

Clinton promised that a "comprehensive agenda" will be released within the next few months, but she did give a few hints while addressing a crowd of supporters in Ames, Iowa, on Sunday. For instance, Clinton said she plans to use tax incentives, including a possible renewable of the wind energy tax credit, to reach her 10-year goal of powering homes in America with renewable energy.

The former secretary of state also talked about transitioning America from fossil fuels to new sources of energy. "We need to get the incentives fixed in our tax system which as you know are too heavily weighted toward fossil fuels," Clinton said Sunday in Iowa.

So far, Clinton's video is a welcome change from much of the climate-change talk we've been hearing this campaign season. While we await Clinton's full agenda, we can at least take comfort in knowing that Clinton has more in common with Pope Francis than Rick "The Pope Is Not A Scientist" Santorum et al.

Strategies In The Entire Race // Bustle // Kendyl Kearly – July 27, 2015

It's still 2015, but candidates in the 2016 presidential race have already begun to claim the most important issues to their platforms, and hash out large-scale plans for dealing with them. Environmentalism is a huge cause for the major candidates on the left, and two of them have been the first to share large environmental protection agendas. On Sunday evening, Hillary Clinton joined Martin O'Malley in providing climate change plans.

O'Malley shared his ideas for a green presidency back in June, winning Democratic praise for being the first major candidate to do so. The proposal is aggressive and came right after Pope Francis' encyclical that expressed the need to protect the Earth from climate change. Although Clinton and O'Malley have the same goal in mind, their plans to accomplish it have some notable differences.

One of Clinton's largest goals centers around solar energy. She says she will expand the amount of installed solar capacity by 700 percent by 2020. According to her website, she wants more than half a billion panels installed by the end of her first term.

O'Malley also wants clean energy to be a part of his presidency. He advocates for the extension of tax credits that fuel the wind and solar panel industries. He would launch an organization that centers around financing community wind and solar programs. He supports loans and grants for farmers and small business owners that encourage them to adopt clean energy.

Unlike Clinton, O'Malley mentioned the use of biofuels. As president, he would use tax credits and EPA volume targets to build a thriving biofuel industry. Although Clinton has not yet said whether biofuels would be a part of her plan, she supported their use during her 2008 campaign.

O'Malley believes that the way to make his plan sustainable is through training workers to embrace environmentally friendly practices. He wants to create an organization that focuses on clean energy jobs. This organization would theoretically partner with communities, build clean energy infrastructures, make buildings more energy efficient, and expand fields and forests. Clinton mentioned a "Clean Energy Challenge" that would partner with states, cities, and rural communities, but it's unclear now what exactly such a challenge would do for those communities.

Whereas Clinton keeps her agenda related to clean energy, O'Malley addresses job creation and economic issues with his ideas. He has also expressed his disapproval of off-shore drilling and tar sand oil energy, while Clinton has been less clear on such controversial environmental issues.

Their timelines differ as well. O'Malley believes that in 35 years, the country could be 100 percent powered by clean energy. Clinton says that by 2020, renewable energy could be a third of all energy generated. Her other goal is for every American home to be powered by clean energy within 10 years of taking office.

At this point, O'Malley's plan is a lot more specific than Clinton's when it comes to implementation and funding. However, Clinton says she will give more details in the coming months. Though she's given more concrete ideas than most other Democratic candidates, she might face pressure to add more specifics if she wants to compare favorably to O'Malley.

Hillary Clinton's Plan to Combat Climate Change With Half-A-Billion Solar Panels //ThinkProgress // Emily Atkin – July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton is going all in on renewable energy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Sunday evening, the Democratic presidential candidate released a fact sheet detailing her plan to fight climate change, and it focuses heavily on promoting clean energy generation across the country.

Among other things, the plan includes a promise to install half a billion solar panels by 2021, or the end of Clinton's first term. That would represent a 700 percent increase from current installations, she said. Clinton also promised that, if elected, enough renewable energy would be produced to power every home in the country within 10 years.

"We can make a transition over time from a fossil fuel economy, predominantly, to a clean renewable energy economy, predominantly," Clinton said in Iowa on Sunday, Yahoo reported.

The aggressive transition to renewables proposed by Clinton would be achieved partially through extending and strengthening tax breaks those industries, Clinton said. Last week, the Senate proposed renewing two tax incentives for the wind industry, which are currently expired.

Clinton is expected to explain more details of the plan during a Monday event in Des Moines, according to Yahoo's report.

Though Clinton has been outspoken about the need to address climate change, many environmentalists have expressed doubt that her policies would be as strong as they may like. They often point to her historic "inclination" to approve the controversial Keystone XL tar sands pipeline, and her support for domestic fossil fuel production, specifically natural gas.

But tackling climate change has been central to Clinton's campaign so far. In her campaign kick-off speech, she promised to make America "the clean energy superpower of the 21st century" and condemned Republican politicians for willfully ignoring the science behind human-caused warming. Her campaign chairman John Podesta was the architect of President Obama's plan to tackle carbon emissions through regulations, and Clinton has promised to keep those regulations in place "at all costs." As ThinkProgress pointed out in April, Clinton's is the first major presidential campaign ever to make combating climate change a central issue.

That certainly does not mean that Clinton's is the only presidential campaign that's put a hard focus on tackling global warming. Indeed, Democratic contender Martin O'Malley arguably has an even more aggressive climate agenda. His plan is to make the country powered completely by renewable energy by 2050 — meaning no fossil fuel use at all. He has condemned President Obama for approving offshore drilling, supporting domestic oil production, and shying away from bold stances on high-carbon tar sands oil from Canada, which would be transported by the Keystone XL pipeline if it were approved.

"We cannot meet the climate challenge with an all-of-the-above energy strategy, or by drilling off our coasts, or by building pipelines that bring oil from tar sands in Canada," O'Malley wrote in an op-ed published last month.

Clinton's other Democratic rival, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-VT) hasn't released an official climate plan yet. But in an interview with the Washington Post in May, he said he would go further than President Obama has in tackling the problem.

Sanders' plan, he said, "would look like a tax on carbon; a massive investment in solar, wind, geothermal; it would be making sure that every home and building in this country is properly winterized; it would be putting substantial money into rail, both passenger and cargo, so we can move towards breaking our dependency on automobiles. And it would be leading other countries around the world."

Hillary Clinton proposes installing half a billion solar panels across America by 2020 // Fusion // Rob Wile – July 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton released Sunday the outlines of how she would tackle climate change if elected president, proposing two ambitious goals.

First, she would install half a billion solar panels across America by the end of her first term.

It would represent an approximately 546%-increase from current production levels. The average solar panel produces 200 watts, and current U.S. solar photovoltaic output was 18.3 gigawatts as of January 2015 according to GTM Research.

This would be part of a larger plan to allow every home in the U.S. to be powered by renewable energy within a decade of her taking office. Currently the residential sector consumes 40% of total electricity output in the U.S, and electricity accounts for 40% of all U.S. energy consumption.

She's calling it the "Clean Energy Challenge," and published this chart to show how much renewable energy would be generated compared with proposals set forth in President Obama's Clean Power Plan:

"Through these goals," the campaign says on its website, "we will increase the amount of installed solar capacity by 700% by 2020, expand renewable energy to at least a third of all electricity generation, prevent thousands of premature deaths and tens of thousands of asthma attacks each year, and put our country on a path to achieve deep emission reductions by 2050."

However, she does not propose ending fossil fuel consumption. Instead, she says she wants to, "reduce the amount of oil consumed in the United States and around the world," and to make sure it is being produced in a "safe and responsible."

No further details were provided on these points.

Many GOPers including Marco Rubio have responded to questions about how they'd address climate change with variations on "I'm not a scientist" (that group also includes Jeb Bush, though he also acknowledged that climate change was occurring but that a balance had to be struck between addressing it without incurring major economic costs).

At an Iowa campaign event Sunday, the Wall Street Journal's Colleen McCain Nelson reported, Hillary mocked the "scientist" remarks.

"I'm not a scientist either—I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain…I know that if we start addressing it, we're going to actually be creating jobs and new businesses."

Last week, renowned climate scientist James Hansen issued one of the most dire climate warnings in years, finding that glaciers at both poles are melting 10-times faster than previously believed, the result of a feedback loop of cold water from already-melting glaciers forcing warmer saltwater underneath remaining glaciers.

As a result, the seas are going to rise way faster, and sooner, than anyone is prepared for.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We conclude that continued high emissions will make multi-meter sea level rise practically unavoidable and likely to occur this century," he wrote. "Social disruption and economic consequences of such large sea level rise could be devastating. It is not difficult to imagine that conflicts arising from forced migrations and economic collapse might make the planet ungovernable, threatening the fabric of civilization."

We are now just four months away from the Paris Climate Conference, at which countries are supposed to come up with a sweeping agreement to address climate change.

But as Slate climate correspondent Eric Holthaus reports, the policies being floated in advance of the summit would actually lead to 3.1 degrees Celsius-temperature-rise this century, according to Climate Action Tracker, a group of independent climate research organizations, with both the U.S.'s and China's CO2 reduction plans rated as inadequate.

In New Climate Change Plan, Hillary Attacks Republicans For Refusing To Accept 'Settled Science' // Daily Caller // Chuck Ross – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton attacked the Republican presidential field on Sunday for refusing "to accept the settled science of climate change" in a new campaign video that she released along with an outline for "two bold national goals" to increase the use of renewable energy in the U.S.

Clinton's plan calls for a 700 percent increase in the number of solar panels in the U.S. by the year 2020. That would create an output of 140 gigabytes — the equivalent of having solar panel systems installed on the rooftops of 25 million U.S. homes. Along with solar energy, Clinton says she plans to increase the use of hydro, wind, and geothermal all with a goal of creating enough renewable energy to power every U.S. home within ten years.

In a 3-minute video, Clinton criticized Republican candidates for their stances on climate change.

"I'm a skeptic. Not a scientist," reads a quote from Jeb Bush. "I'm not a scientist," reads another from Marco Rubio.

"I may not be a scientist, but I'm a grandmother with two eyes and a brain," Clinton said in an email announcing the video, repeating a line she's used frequently on the campaign trail this week.

According to the outline of Clinton's plan, she will propose a "climate action competition" which will provide competitive grants and provide incentives to "empower states to exceed federal carbon pollution standards." She also plans to set up what she's calling a Solar X-Prize. That will provide awards to communities that find ways to "cut the red tape that slows rooftop installation times and increases costs for businesses and consumers."

In addition to the competitions, Clinton said she will work to extend clean energy tax incentives and to expand the use of renewable energy on federal lands and property. She also called for reducing "the amount of oil consumed in the United States and around the world."

Clinton also stated that she would "protect the health and retirement security" of coalfield workers. The proposed shift toward renewable and clean energy is expected to displace many of those workers.

The plan will "prevent thousands of premature deaths and tens of thousands of asthma attacks each year" while helping the U.S. “meet our national and international climate targets,” Clinton claimed.

Glaringly absent from Clinton’s plan is any mention of Keystone XL, the Canadian oil pipeline being blocked by the Obama administration. Clinton has declined to weigh in on whether she thinks that the pipeline should be approved, saying that she is waiting for the State Department to decide whether it will approve. The State Department’s stonewalling has not stopped Clinton’s Democratic competitors from weighing in on the issue, however. Both Vermont U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley have said that they oppose the pipeline.

Clinton Announces Energy Plan, Wants to Install A Half-Billion Solar Panels By End Of First Term // IB Times // Sarah Berger – July 27, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton said Sunday she doesn't want future generations looking back and us and wondering how we could "possibly be so irresponsible" when it comes to climate change. Clinton, in announcing her climate and energy agenda, made her first goal having more than a half-billion solar panels installed across the country by the end of her first term. Her second goal is to generate enough renewable energy to power every home in America within 10 years of taking office.

“Future generations will look back and wonder what were we thinking. How could we possibly be so irresponsible? ” Clinton said in the opening seconds of a video posted to her website. “I’m just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain, and I know what’s happening in the world is going to have a big effect on my daughter, and especially on my granddaughter.”

In the video, Clinton said the renewable energy industry prevents as many as 70,000 asthma attacks and 3,000 premature deaths each year. Last year, the industry created 50,000 jobs and drove more than $35 billion in investments, according to the video.

“It’s hard to believe there are people running for president who still refuse to accept the settled science of climate change, who’d rather remind us they're not scientists than listen to those who are,” Clinton said in the video. “You don’t have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all. You just have to be willing to act.”

Clinton reinforced her energy plan at a campaign stop in Ames, Iowa, calling for an extension of federal clean energy tax incentives and to make them more cost effective, Reuters reported.

She also has plans to fight back against efforts that attempt to push back President Barack Obama’s executive actions to curb carbon emissions from power plants. Clinton will be talking about her proposals Monday at an energy-efficient transit station Iowa.

Clinton: We can protect planet and add jobs // Des Moines Register // Tony Leys – July 27, 2015

America can combat climate change while expanding its economy, Hillary Clinton told Iowans Sunday.

"I know if we start addressing it, we will actually be creating jobs and new businesses," the Democratic frontrunner for president told about 450 voters gathered at Iowa State University.

Too many people believe steps to protect the planet from global warming would cripple the economy, she said. In fact, she said, clean-energy industries have some of the strongest potential to add jobs. She cited a report that the solar-energy industry now has nearly twice as many workers as the coal industry. The report was based on an industry survey that said 174,000 Americans worked in the solar-energy businesses in 2013, compared with 93,000 in coal.

Later Sunday, Clinton released a video on her website in which she pledged to have 500 million solar panels installed within four years and to set a 10-year goal of having enough renewable energy to power every American home.

"This is not complicated, folks," she told her Ames audience, adding a critique of Republicans that has become a stock laugh generator in her campaign appearances: "Those people on the other side, they will answer any question about climate change by saying, 'I'm not a scientist.' Well, I'm not a scientist either. I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain."

She lauded Iowa for obtaining 30 percent of its electricity from wind energy, second only to Texas. That energy comes from the huge turbines that dot the landscape, including many built in Iowa, she noted, to cheers and applause. She also noted that Iowa is growing crops that can be used for fuel, and it has started getting involved in solar businesses.

"The people who argue against this are just not paying attention," she said.

She said the U.S. should use its tax code and other methods to encourage the new industries. At the same time, she said, the country should not turn its back on the people who made their living in older energy industries, especially coal.

"I am grateful, as we all should be, to those men who mined the coal, that created the industrial revolution that turned on the lights that fueled our factories — who lost their lives, who were grievously injured, who developed black lung disease," she said. "They helped build our economy, so it is important that we help them transition to a new economy. I don't want to walk away from anybody that contributed to America."

Later Sunday, at a smaller event at a private home near Carroll, Clinton urged supporters to talk about the possibility of new energy jobs with the same enthusiasm as those looking to stick to sources such as coal.

"People who want to protect the jobs of the past have very loud voices," she said. "We need to elevate our decibel level a little bit, to talk about the jobs in solar, in wind, in advanced biofuels and in energy efficiency."

Global warming tends to be a much bigger concern among Democrats than among Republicans. Other Democratic presidential contenders also are offering plans. For example, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has called for America to be completely powered by renewable energy by 2050.

Clinton's stances drew strong applause in her Sunday appearances. In Ames, Iowa State University graduate student Mathew Bradley, 21, was among several people who wore orange T-shirts touting their membership in the NextGen Climate group. Bradley, who is studying electrical engineering, hopes to gain a job in a new-energy industry.

He was mildly surprised to hear Clinton's claim that nearly twice as many Americans work in the solar industry as work in the coal industry. But he said it's possible, given how mechanized the coal industry has become and how fast the solar industry is growing. "It's such an up-and-coming industry. It makes sense" there would be so many jobs in making and installing solar equipment, he said.

He said he was undecided on a presidential candidate but was heartened to hear Clinton's words about climate change. "It's nice to hear politicians are interested in what I'm passionate about."

Hillary Clinton touts solar energy plan to court environmentalists in presidential run // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph – July 27, 2015

Hillary Clinton unveiled some big goals to slow climate change while seeking to “make America the world's clean energy super-power” on Monday, looking to lock down environmentalists' support. But she continued to dodge on some hot-button issues.

“The reality of climate change is unforgiving, no matter what the deniers say,” she said Monday in Des Moines, Iowa, after touring an environmentally friendly train station.

Clinton set goals for a half-billion solar panels to be installed by the end of her first term, 2020, and a 10-year goal of generating enough renewable energy “to power every single home in America.” That would mark a sevenfold increase of solar energy production in five years.

“America needs to lead this fight, not go MIA,” she said.

The speech followed a video released Sunday night in which the Democratic front-runner outlined the plans.

"Future generations will look back and wonder, what were we thinking? How could we possibly be so irresponsible?" she says as the video begins, before quotes of GOP presidential candidates questioning the science of climate change appear onscreen.

"You don't have to be a scientist to take on this urgent challenge that threatens us all; you just have to be willing to act," she says.

The plan, according to Clinton's campaign, would leave the U.S. generating at least one-third of all electricity from renewable resources by 2027.

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton speaks to supporters July 25 in Iowa, where she's expected to expand on her green energy plan Tuesday.

But Clinton didn’t mention a number of issues key to environmental activists.

She didn’t state her positions on the Keystone XL oil pipeline, implementing a carbon tax, fracking and drilling in the Arctic Ocean.

Both of her main primary opponents, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, have already unveiled ambitious green energy plans, and both oppose Keystone.

Clinton once again refused to weigh in on Keystone in Des Moines, arguing that because she was secretary of state when the government began the cost-benefit analysis of the plan she shouldn’t publicly comment on it until the Obama administration releases its findings.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I know that there is a very careful evaluation pending,” she said before noting she was “confident” the study into the proposed trans-national oil pipeline would take into account its environmental impacts.

“I will refrain from commenting because I had a leading role in getting that process started and I think we have to let it run its course,” she said.

She also sidestepped a question about a carbon tax.

Clinton's plan quickly drew praise from some, but not all, major green groups.

Billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer has called for half of all energy production to come from renewables by 2030 — a goal Clinton's campaign says her plan would achieve, counting nuclear energy.

"Today, Hillary Clinton emerged as a strong leader in solving the climate crisis," Steyer, who already has held a fund-raiser for Clinton, said in a statement. "We look forward to hearing more details about her proposals to tackle climate change."

Bill McKibben of the environmental group 350.org wasn’t as sold, saying she was “half way there” and praising her commitment to renewable energy.

“Now, we need Clinton to show she understands the other half of the climate change equation — and prove she has the courage to stand up against fossil fuel projects,” he said.

Clinton was light on specifics - she promised to flesh out her green energy plan "over the coming months."

New figures on Afghan National Security Forces personnel released by SIGAR and the Department of Defense on Tuesday indicated that the number of ANA soldiers had fallen roughly 15,000 between the falls of 2013 and 2014. The main suspect in the Karachi Baldia factory fire has "mysteriously disappeared", according to Rangers officials who met on Tuesday; investigators and victims' families are also reportedly facing threats from unspecified sources. The Afghan attorney general's office announced Tuesday that it had arrested the former deputy head of the Afghan Central Bank in connection to a verdict in the Kabul Bank case last year, although he is reported to have turned himself in in December. The Supreme Court has pressed the Election Commission of Pakistan to issue a local elections schedule today; ECP officials say that the vote in Khyber Paktunkhwa will take place June 8. Pres. Ghani has ordered a review of all Afghan military logistics contracts, Reuters reports, ahead of his visit to the U.S. later this month.*

together, act together and move forward with the spirit of bringing the two nations closer to each other." Indian diplomatic sources described the visit as part of a regional tour of SAARC countries and not a resumption of bilateral composite dialogue talks, although some Pakistani analysts interpreted it as having been undertaken at the insistence of the United States following Pres. Obama's visit to India last month. No joint communiqué was issued following Jaishankar's meetings with his Pakistani counterpart Aizaz Chaudhry, although Chaudhry said that "all issues of concern" were discussed, including alleged Indian support for separatist groups in FATA and Balochistan. Lawyers for accused Lashkar-e-Taiba operative Zakiur Rehman Lakvhi told the Express Tribune that Jaishankar's visit was intended to "put further pressure on Pakistan"; responded to earlier questions about whether Lakhvi's case was discussed Chaudhry suggested that "there wasn't enough time to go into detail on every issue." - Senate Elections: The Lahore High Court gave the federal government until March 17 to respond to a petition seeking a constitutional amendment to hold senate elections under open ballot; the Senate vote is scheduled for March 5. Meanwhile, former Pres. Zardari met with party members in the Punjab assembly on Tuesday to discuss strategy for the upcoming election; the party hopes to win support for its sole candidate from Punjab from disaffected PML-N assembly members, in part through the help of former Punjab governor Chaudhry Muhammad Sarwar , who joined the PTI after quitting the PML-N last month. In Khyber Paktunkhwa, the Awami Jamhoor Ittehad Pakistan party has yet to merge with the PTI ahead of the election, despite the party's grant of a senate candidacy ticket to Liaqat Khan Taraki, the father of the party's leader. [ET] [ET] [Dawn]
- Baldia Fire Investigation: A meeting of senior officials of the paramilitary Sindh Rangers in Karachi on Tuesday "expressed concern over attempts by some elements to interfere in the Baldia Town factory fire case investigation", Dawn reports. Rizwan Quraishi, an MQM activist who linked the fire to extortion attempts and who has been disowned by the party, is now reported to have disappeared as a second investigation commission has begun a review the causes of the fire; the investigating officers and family members of the victims have reportedly been subjected to threats.
- Local Elections: Election Commission officials told the Supreme Court on Wednesday that they would announce a schedule for local elections by April 6 and that polls will be held June 8 in Khyber Paktunkhwa, January 10, 2016 in Punjab, and February 22, 2016, in Sindh — the court ordered the formal announcement to be made by 8:00 PM today. The attorney general sought to deflect a contempt of court petition against the federal government for failing to hold the elections in military cantonment areas, where it has direct responsibility, by laying blame on the senate for not taking up the issue. [Dawn]
- Election Complaints: The Supreme Court issued its detailed verdict from December of its judgment clearing Prime Minister Sharif from PTI challenges seeking his disqualification on the grounds that he had lied before parliament and thus violated Articles 62 and 63 of the Constitution, which requires candidates be "righteous, sagacious, and ameen", a qualification the court noted was vague and ill-defined. Separately, the election tribunal hearing complaints into the NA-122 Lahore constituency accepted a PTI petition seeking thumbprint verification on all ballot counterfoils.
- Regulator Service: The government is reportedly considering the creation of a new civil service branch for the main government regulatory bodies — including the Oil and Gas Regulatory Authority, National Electric Power Regulatory Authority, Pakistan Telecommunications Authority, and Pakistan Electronic Media Regulatory Authority. Current appointments to these bodies are made by independent panels; Dawn suggests the measure is under consideration part due to clashes between the government and the nominally independent regulators.

- ANSF Attrition: Figures released by the Special Inspector for Afghan Reconstruction on Tuesday — following their declassification after top U.S. commander Gen. John Campbell reversed a previous classification order in January — indicated that the number of Afghan National Army soldiers had declined from roughly 184,000 to roughly 169,000 between the falls of 2013 and 2014. SIGAR questioned figures offered for Afghan police, suggesting that the actual number might be roughly 151,000 instead of roughly 156,000 as reported. [SIGAR Report (pdf)]
- Zabul Operations: The provincial police chief of Zabul province, Ghulam Sakhi Rogh Lewanai, told RFE/RL on Wednesday that at least 32 militants had been killed in operations in the Khak-e-Afghan district that began the day prior; he said that all were associated with Daesh, or the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria. Local accounts of the identity of gunmen responsible for the kidnapping of 30 Hazara men from the district last week have conflicted over their affiliations; an anonymous caller to RFE/RL reporters claimed affiliation with Daesh but said that only seven fighters had been killed.

- Kabul Bank Arrests: On Tuesday, the Afghan attorney general's office announced that it had imprisoned Mohibullah Safi, the former deputy head of the Afghan Central Bank, in connection to the 2010 Kabul Bank crisis. Safi received a one-year sentence in connection to the case last fall, but fled the country. A meeting of TAPI members in February in Islamabad failed to reach an agreement on a consortium leader for the financing and construction of the pipeline, which Turkmenistan reportedly aims to do by October.

[Subtitle:] With the Republican Tea Party Caucus on the loose, the public will not like what it sees.

At the risk of being seen as happiest in war, in the wake of the midterms I believe Democrats should avoid intramural recriminations, hew to the old adage that there's a silver lining in every cloud and focus now on the tremendous -- and potentially historic -- political opportunities before us in two years.

I won't dwell on what is already known: The 2014 midterms were fought on unpromising grounds for Democrats, to say the least. It was the second midterm of a presidency, when losses in Congress are almost inevitable. The Senate seats up this time were mostly in the South and border states. It was impossible for our candidates to articulate the case for President Obama's achievements in the face of Republican negativity and scare tactics.

So onto the good news: With few exceptions, our candidates ran strong races in this adverse climate and ably stood up for Democratic values. The Clintons stood up for an inclusive national party, tirelessly campaigning across the Midwest and South. And Democratic donors and outside groups stood up, ensuring our candidates were financially competitive to the end.

Republican candidates ran a wolf in sheep's clothing strategy, misrepresenting themselves as moderates to get power. Republicans like Cory Gardner, Scott Walker and Joni Ernst all disavowed their long history of opposing abortion in all circumstances. Republicans not only have no economic agenda, they claimed to support popular parts of the Democrats' agenda that they have long opposed. Republican candidates across the country shifted leftward on Medicare, Social Security, reproductive rights, energy policy, poverty and the minimum wage.

We have seen this movie before: In 2010, Republicans said they would stick to economics if they won the House, but among the first bills they passed were three that restricted women's rights.

Republicans had planned to run against Obamacare this year, but in recent weeks, their attacks lessened. Republicans struggled to articulate their opposition because they know Obamacare is here to stay. Americans want to keep it.

When the clock struck twelve Tuesday night, the Republican presidential contest began, and the 2016 Democrats had something to run against: the Republican Congress. Played right, both can be a gift that keeps on giving to Democrats. We are not in charge anymore, and the truth is that the recalcitrant Republican House frequently made being in charge an exercise in futility.

The Tea Party caucus in the House is now stronger. The Republican presidential primaries are weighted to the right – and Senators Ted Cruz, Rand Paul, and Marco Rubio will invariably tack in that direction, exercising a gravitational pull over the internal processes of Congress. They will set off vicious rivalries, both among themselves and with the Republican older guard, which itself may fracture over which establishment horse to back in blocking a Tea Partier from the nomination. Mitch McConnell may run the Senate, but it often won't seem that way.

The setup for Democrats is: Will Republicans reject extremism? On issue after issue – rolling back health care, women's reproductive rights, voting rights, immigrant rights and opposing nominations – the GOP can either be discredited or they can be split in this cycle.

The same dynamic will unfold with respect to all of the pseudo-scandals the Republicans will gin up and investigate; already, loose talk of impeachment permeates the outer reaches of the conservative movement.

First, extremism. Then, corruption. The special interests that paid for this victory know that in all likelihood it will be short-lived, and thus they will behave like pigs at the trough. Their real agenda will be revealed when they seek to undo and rewrite regulations for their own benefit, such as undermining environmental protections and seek all manner of goodies from Senate appropriators.

Once established, the extremism and corruption of the Republican majority can be used to define the Republican presidential field. Meanwhile the internal Republican turmoil can be pointed to as a constant lesson of Republican incapacity for governance across the board.

As a first order of business, Democrats can begin to come back by highlighting the GOP's extremism at every turn, exposing their subservience to special-interest masters, debunking their scandal hoaxes and exploiting their conflicts and divisions.

USA Today: “Clinton backers, Democrats gear up for 2016”

[Subtitle:] Pro-Clinton super PACs plan major donor outreach this month

WASHINGTON — Democratic strategists and donors Wednesday sought to quickly pivot away from their coast-to-coast midterm defeats, and prepare for the 2016 political battleground that includes the high-stakes presidential fight and more than two-dozen Senate races.

Groups backing Hillary Rodham Clinton's likely candidacy, for instance, plan major gatherings with donors in the weeks ahead. On Nov. 20, a super PAC called Correct the Record will hold a lunch with current and prospective donors in New York City. A day later, top donors to another pro-Clinton group, Ready for Hillary, will meet for a strategy session.

"When the clock struck 12, the Republican and Democratic presidential races sort of started, even though we don't know what the field looks like," said David Brock, the founder of pro-Democratic American Bridge, an opposition-research group. Correct the Record is an American Bridge arm focused on defending Clinton's record.

Another pro-Clinton super PAC, Priorities USA Action, is starting outreach to contributors "to begin building for the 2016 cycle," said Peter Kauffman, the group's spokesman. The group had avoided fundraising until after the midterms.

The rapid buildup among Democrats comes after Republicans swept control of the Senate and captured their biggest House majority in more than 80 years.

The GOP takeover may provide a boost to Clinton, who could use Capitol Hill as an election foil, observers say. "With both houses of Congress now controlled by the GOP, there will be a clear contrast between the parties that Priorities USA Action will help define during the 2016 presidential campaign," Kauffman said.

Both parties already have set their sights on the 2016 Senate battleground.

Of the 32 seats up that year, Republicans are defending 19. The list includes six first-term Republican senators from states President Obama won in 2012 : Sens. Ron Johnson in Wisconsin, Mark Kirk in Illinois, Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania, Marco Rubio in Florida, Rob Portman in Ohio and Kelly Ayotte in New Hampshire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A seventh, North Carolina Sen. Richard Burr, is competing in a swing state Obama captured in 2008.

Top Republicans and the leaders of outside groups that helped bankroll their victory said they were acutely aware that the GOP legislators only had a two-year window to prove themselves to voters, and were eager to avoid the kinds of confrontations that led to the 2013 government shutdown

Republicans "now have the opportunity to earn the trust of the American people by putting pro-growth legislation on the president's desk," said Steve Law, the president and CEO of American Crossroads, one of the leading Republican super PACs.

Republicans also have made it clear that they are ready for the White House fight, too. Early Wednesday, the RNC blasted a 10-page memo to reporters with the subject line: "Hillary's Policies Were on The Ballot."

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, a likely Republican president contender, taunted Clinton on Twitter, posting pictures of her stumping for an array of failed Senate candidates with the hashtag #HillaryLosers.

Bloomberg: “Republicans Tie Hillary Clinton to Democratic Losses”

By Jonathan Allen

November 6, 2014

Republican Senator Rand Paul yesterday tied Hillary Clinton to Democratic losses in the midterm elections, tweeting with the hashtag “HILLARYSLOSERS” as an opening shot in the 2016 presidential contest.

The Republican National Committee and the Republican super-political action committee America Rising echoed the Kentucky senator’s line of attack, which centered on blaming Clinton for the defeat of Democratic senators for whom she campaigned. The message: Voters rejected Clinton.

The sharpened focus on Clinton raises the question of whether her stock went up or down after the Nov. 4 elections. And it’s a sign that Republicans want to draw her out so they can test her reflexes at a time when Democrats are divided over whether she should jump into the race now or wait until next year.

“Early shots across the bow test whether she really has improved as a candidate,” Republican strategist Mary Matalin said. They also allow Republicans to “assess her response mechanism” if she responds, see what role former President Bill Clinton takes on in defending her, invigorate potential primary challengers and tie her to President Barack Obama, “for whom distancing herself for a 2016 run is mandatory,” Matalin said.

Nick Merrill, a Clinton spokesman, declined to comment.

Campaign Stops

Clinton appeared on behalf of five losing Democratic Senate candidates, in Colorado, Kentucky, North Carolina, Georgia and Iowa, and at least three victors, in New Hampshire, Michigan and Minnesota. Several Democratic operatives said Clinton's stops for Democratic candidates in the final weeks of the campaign showcased her loyalty and will help her unify the party behind her for 2016.

"Hillary Clinton worked for Democrats across the country because she believes in an all–inclusive Democratic Party," said Adrienne Elrod, communications director for the pro-Clinton super-PAC Correct the Record. "Hillary Clinton's commitment to support, strengthen and grow our Democratic Party was clear as she made 45 midterm-related political stops where she stood with Democrats and shared her vision of what our nation needs for the future."

Democrats lost at least seven seats in the midterm elections, including contested races in the presidential battlegrounds of Iowa and Colorado.

Clinton Conclusions

Clinton should draw two main conclusions from the results, according to a Democratic strategist who spoke on the condition of anonymity to avoid angering the former secretary of state at a time when she is laying low.

First, this strategist said, Democrats were defending tough turf that they might not need to win the 2016 election. Outside of Iowa and Colorado, Democratic Senate candidates lost in Republican-heavy states, places like South Dakota and Montana that Clinton wouldn't need to win the White House.

Second, Clinton has to find a way to persuade the American public she's a tougher leader than Obama without distancing herself from him so much that she alienates a Democratic base that remains very loyal to him.

There are more warning signs for Clinton in both voter surveys and the final results of the races, said a Democratic pollster who spoke on the condition of anonymity to avoid criticizing the woman who is expected to be the party's presidential nominee in 2016.

Campaigns matter, this pollster said, comparing the dysfunctional operations run by some of this year's losers to the drama-wracked outfit Clinton presided over when she ran for president in 2008. Clinton will also have to find a way to energize and motivate a Democratic base that showed underlying weaknesses over the last year.

Also, Clinton has to talk more about the economy than Democratic candidates did in this election cycle, the pollster said. Exit polls showed that the economy was the No. 1 concern of people who voted in the midterm elections, and she needs to win those people over with a cogent economic message, this pollster said.

NEW ORLEANS — Burns Strider, a native Mississippian who has advised the Democratic Party on faith issues, spent Tuesday night watching the election returns with a couple of other Democratic consultants and a bottle of small-batch bourbon. It was that kind of night.

The Republican wave on Tuesday washed over the whole country, including Massachusetts and Maryland, but it was in the South that the swamping of statewide Democratic prospects appeared most complete.

The rout went well beyond the Senate races — Republicans won all of those in the South except for a squeaker in Virginia and one in Louisiana that has gone to a runoff that Republicans are favored to win — and down to the state level, smothering hopes for strong Democratic farm teams.

Republicans won all seven governor’s races in the South, nearly all by double-digit margins. They expanded majorities in five Southern state legislatures; in the Tennessee Senate, the Republicans now outnumber Democrats 28 to five.

In the foggy hangover of Wednesday morning, Democrats in the South maintained in interviews that such Republican gains should not be considered permanent. But neither were they kidding themselves about the length and difficulty of the road ahead.

“You don’t rebuild Atlanta in a day,” Mr. Strider said.

After decades of decline from once-total control of the South, Democrats already had little left to lose before the election. Names of successful candidates past, like Carter, Nunn and Pryor, showed up in the loss column on Tuesday; Senator Kay Hagan of North Carolina came close but was defeated as well.

In perhaps the most emblematic victory, a Republican, Rick Allen, beat John Barrow of Georgia, the last white Democrat in the House from a Deep South state. His defeat was a testament to just how rare white Democrats have become in the region, a rarity that cuts across categories. In Georgia, according to exit polls by Edison Research, 80 percent of whites who did not graduate from college voted for David Perdue, the Republican Senate candidate. Among white college graduates, that number was not much lower, at 70 percent.

For Democrats and Republicans alike, there was a common culprit.

“It’s Obama,” Mike Beebe, a Democrat and the departing governor of Arkansas, said in his office at the State Capitol on Wednesday. “It wasn’t just Arkansas. It was all over the country. There’s only one common denominator.”

Still, the series of Democratic defeats that Mr. Beebe attributed to President Obama have been particularly overwhelming in his state. Four years ago, Arkansas had a congressional delegation that was five-sixths Democratic, a Democratic governor, a Democratic-controlled legislature and an all-Democratic slate of statewide officials. It will now be Republican from top to bottom.

While Democrats in the South may agree that this election was a rejection of Mr. Obama, there is less agreement on how or where to build back here. The conservative Deep South was never going to be the heart of Mr. Obama's culturally liberal coalition. But many Democrats saw this next-generational appeal making inroads in New South states with increasingly diverse populations, like Georgia and North Carolina.

Kasim Reed, the mayor of Atlanta, said he still believed that this was the way forward for Democrats in Georgia.

"We needed to change the electorate," Mr. Reed said. He faulted the campaigns of Michelle Nunn, who was following in her father's footsteps in running for the Senate, and Jason Carter, a grandson of Jimmy Carter who was running for governor, for not spending more time and resources to register and turn out what he said were roughly 600,000 unregistered black voters in Georgia, and 200,000 unregistered Latinos.

Democrats like Mr. Reed remain adamant that Georgia is a state that could be in play, in spite of the decisive Republican victories on Tuesday. Many also believe that the older, rural, white working-class voters who were once the bedrock of the Democratic Party in the South are now permanently out of reach, and that attempts to attract them are a waste of time.

But others contend Democrats are doomed if they cannot appeal to a broad swath of Southern whites.

"In order to have even a chance to compete, something's got to change for the Democrats in the South," said Geoff Garin, a Democratic consultant and pollster. "Even with increased African-American and Hispanic participation, it's simply not a viable situation to struggle to get above the mid-20s with white voters." Bill Fletcher, a Democratic consultant who was raised in rural Tennessee, agreed that this year's race was mainly a rejection of Mr. Obama, adding that his presidency had given rise to "a nasty strain of racism that many of us thought and hoped had gone away."

But he said socially moderate, fiscally conservative candidates could still win in the rural South, with the right candidate and a strong economic message. After all, Ms. Nunn and Ms. Hagan both led among voters whose household incomes were less than $50,000 a year.

"I don't think we have to go all in with a one-size-fits-all strategy," Mr. Fletcher said. "A strategy that works in San Francisco is going to be by necessity different than the strategy that we need in rural Tennessee, rural Georgia or, for that matter, rural Florida."

But Democrats were not the only ones considering the way forward. Some Republicans, while flush with victory, were fully aware that the whiter and older electorate that gave Republicans such a resounding victory on Tuesday could not be counted on forever, and are already planning to secure and even expand on their gains in the South.

"If we just assume we're safe, we're wrong," said Henry Barbour, a Mississippi-based lobbyist and a member of the Republican National Committee. "Mississippi, like the rest of the country, is changing. If Republicans don't do a genuinely good job of engaging African-Americans, Hispanics and Asians, women and young voters, it becomes much more plausible for a statewide Democrat from Mississippi to win."

Mr. Barbour pointed to several lessons in this year's bizarre Senate primary in Mississippi. He held up State

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Chris McDaniel, a Tea Party candidate who nearly won the primary runoff, as the kind of divisive Republican who could threaten the party's general appeal. On the other hand, Mr. Barbour pointed to the runoff victory of the incumbent, Senator Thad Cochran, which was due in part to a high turnout among black voters, as a potential model for an expanded Republican base.

The Election Day victory of Tim Scott, a Republican in South Carolina and the first black senator to be popularly elected from a Southern state, is another sign that the South's most solid political fact — the strict correlation between race and partisanship — may yet be malleable.

For now, Mr. Strider is patiently enduring another round of obituaries for the Southern Democrat. They have become rather common these days. But whether out of shock or denial or fortitude, he insisted that such reports were greatly exaggerated.

"I've probably heard more eulogies during the time I've lived in D.C., about the death of this party or the death of this cause, than a choir at a First Baptist Church," he said. "They always rise from the dead."

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Day after the elections, pro-Clinton super PAC Priorities USA kicks into gear"

By Matea Gold

November 5, 2014, 3:28 p.m. EST

In the aftermath of Tuesday's crushing defeats, the Democratic donor class is already turning its attention to the 2016 presidential contest and ramping up what is expected to be a massive outside flanking operation to back an expected White House bid by Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The work started first thing Wednesday morning, when Hollywood mogul Jeffrey Katzenberg's team began making calls to secure donations for Priorities USA Action, the super PAC that will serve as the big-money advertising vehicle for Clinton.

Andy Spahn, a political strategist who advises Katzenberg and other clients, said that he has started reviewing donor lists and calling wealthy Democratic backers to get their commitments. He and the DreamWorks Animation chief plan to travel around the country to meet with potential contributors in person.

"We will reaching out in the weeks ahead to set up one-on-ones and meet-and-greets to talk about the urgency of the task ahead," Spahn told The Washington Post.

"Priorities will start today," he added.

Along with Katzenberg and Spahn, a slew of other Priorities USA officials are beginning the early donor outreach, including board co-chair and former Michigan Gov. Jennifer Granholm, executive director Buffy Wicks and senior advisers Sean Sweeney and Paul Begala.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As part of their pitch, Priorities officials plan to walk through the impact the group had in 2012, when the super PAC supported President Obama's reelection and played a key role in shaping early perceptions of GOP challenger Mitt Romney. The message: it will be essential in 2016 to have ample resources available early in the cycle.

The super PAC will not begin collecting contributions unless and until Clinton announces her candidacy.

"Priorities USA Action officials will be engaging supporters over the next few months to discuss the critical role we played in helping reelect a Democratic president in 2012 and to begin building for the 2016 cycle," said Peter Kauffmann, a spokesman for the super PAC.

The group's rapid kick-off illustrates how Democrats have come to embrace independent groups such as super PACs -- a turn-about from the disdain many had for such vehicles during the last two elections. This year, one of the top-spending groups was Senate Majority PAC, a super PAC run by top advisers to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, which poured more than $60 million into trying to protect Democratic incumbents.

Despite Tuesday's losses, Spahn said he does not believe Democratic patrons will be reluctant to give to Priorities.

"I think our donors will double down," he said, adding that they will be driven not only by the presidential contest, but "by the ambition to retake the Senate."

Katzenberg, in particular, is intensely focused on using the super PAC to bolster Clinton. After 2012, he drove the effort to refashion Priorities into the premiere pro-Clinton vehicle for 2016.

The group now has a board stocked with powerful party figures, co-chaired by Granholm and former Obama campaign manager Jim Messina.

Priorities USA, which was largely dormant during 2014, is part of a constellation of independent groups already working to support her bid. The super PAC Ready for Hillary spent the last two years mobilizing a grassroots network of activists on her behalf, while the opposition research group American Bridge has developed a team focused on rapid response on her behalf.

Washington Post: "Why the Senate GOP takeover might actually help Hillary Clinton"

By Anne Gearan

The Republican takeover of the Senate could be good news for at least one Democrat: Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Clinton campaigned hard this fall for Democrats, working to boost the party's effort to preserve its Senate majority — an effort that failed dramatically in Tuesday's GOP midterm rout.

But many Democratic strategists said the switch to Republican control may have a silver lining for Clinton, helping her better define herself as she shapes a potential 2016 presidential campaign. By providing a convenient foil for her and other Democrats, a GOP-run Congress would make it less imperative for Clinton to highlight her differences with President Obama, these strategists said.

Obama's damaged, lame-duck condition also makes Clinton the strongest Democrat left standing.

A Republican Senate is likely to "spend a lot of time trying to repeal some of the progress made in the Obama administration," Democratic strategist Erik Smith said. "That would be a great situation for her, because she could both make the case against the Republicans while currying favor with the Obama base."

But GOP adviser Stuart Stevens, the chief strategist for Mitt Romney's 2012 presidential campaign, said the notion that an all-Republican Congress is good for Clinton will not bear out.

"I don't buy it," he said, because Congress will pass legislation that Obama will then veto, and that will not leave Clinton much running room. "What's she going to say? 'I would have vetoed it, too, so I'm going to be the third term of Barack Obama'?"

Two years before the 2016 presidential election, Clinton is in the enviable but precarious position of being the most popular, most famous and most scrutinized contender for a race that everyone assumes she is already running.

The shadow campaign began in earnest Wednesday, when Hollywood mogul Jeffrey Katzenberg's team began making calls to secure donations for the Priorities USA Action super PAC, which aims to serve as Clinton's big-money advertising vehicle.

Andy Spahn, a political strategist who advises Katzenberg and other clients, said he has started reviewing donor lists and calling wealthy Democratic backers to get their commitments. "We will be reaching out in the weeks ahead to set up one-on-ones and meet-and-greets to talk about the urgency of the task ahead," Spahn said.

First, however, Clinton will have to overcome the short-term damage from Tuesday's Democratic losses. Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), a likely presidential candidate in 2016, said Wednesday on CNN that the election result was "not only a repudiation of the president but, I think, really a repudiation of Hillary Clinton."

The midterm vote holds lessons for Clinton about which issues most resonate with the grumpy 2014 electorate and which are likely to matter in an election that is still far off, according to political advisers and analysts who are close to the former secretary of state or are watching her. Most agreed that she must fashion a way to run against Washington — a task that will be easier with a GOP Congress.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The losses also raise doubts about whether the “Obama coalition” of youths and minorities will turn out for anyone but Obama. No candidate, including Clinton, is likely to win as large a share of the black and Hispanic vote as Obama did in 2008 or 2012. But Clinton probably would do better among whites in many states, while possibly expanding Democratic margins among women.

Democrats are hoping the new Republican Senate majority will quickly annoy voters by overreaching or contributing to Washington’s political paralysis. That environment could benefit other potential Democratic 2016 candidates, but perhaps Clinton most of all, strategists and backers said.

“The likelihood that a Republican Congress does either nothing or does the wrong thing I think is an opportunity for her,” said Tracy Sefl, a Democratic campaign veteran who is advising the independent pro-Clinton super PAC Ready for Hillary.

In the week before the election, Clinton stumped for Senate candidates in states including Iowa and New Hampshire, which will hold the first nominating contests in 2016. The Democratic Senate candidate in Iowa lost, but the reelection of Sen. Jeanne Shaheen (D) in New Hampshire was one of the few bright spots for the party Tuesday.

Clinton spent her final day of campaigning with Shaheen in the state, which she won in the 2008 presidential primary after losing badly to Obama in Iowa. Then, as now, Clinton was considered the heir apparent to the Democratic mantle — a whiff of coronation that did not serve her well.

“There’s a lot to be learned from failure. She wasn’t elected, as we all know,” said Madison Waters, 22, who came to a rally in Nashua, N.H., on Sunday to see Clinton. “I think she was great then, but she’s even better now. She’s sharper and more focused.”

As she did throughout her energetic speaking schedule on behalf of Democrats this year, Clinton sprinkled her Nashua stump speech with personal asides and a long view to the future.

“When you look 20, 25 years out and you think — ‘What’s the country going to be like when she’s starting her adult life? What’s the world going to be like?’ — it really does focus your mind on what’s important,” Clinton said, referring to Charlotte, her newborn granddaughter.

She added that she and Bill Clinton “were raised to believe that if you work hard, the American dream was in your reach. You should not have to be the grandchild of a governor, or a senator, or a former secretary of state, or a former president, to believe that the American dream is in your reach.”

Those themes of in-this-together populism and middle-class promise seem sure to be a central part of Hillary Clinton’s platform if she runs. “When she talks about her grandchild, that makes her very personable,” Kevin Smith, 51, said at the Nashua rally. He said he supported Obama in 2008 but is likely to support Clinton now.

The most recent pre-election polling puts Clinton far ahead of potential Republican opponents. The numbers in the latest Washington Post-ABC News survey also show that Clinton remains a polarizing, if nearly universally recognizable, political figure.

When asked whether she would make a good president, 51 percent said yes and 41 percent said no. Just 8 percent said they had no opinion.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans fare less well. For former Florida governor Jeb Bush, the numbers were 26 percent favorable, 51 percent unfavorable and 23 percent with no opinion. For Paul, 21 percent said he would be a good president, 44 percent said he would not and 34 percent had no opinion.

Bill Burton, a former Obama campaign strategist, said that with little room to run as an “outsider,” Clinton probably would tune her message to those of her Republican rivals.

“Her foil has really got to be the Republicans running against her,” he said. “It’s going to be really easy to run against what Rand Paul and [Sen. Marco] Rubio and those other guys are saying.”

Paul is already working hard to contrast himself with Clinton. As the scope of the Republican wave became clear late Tuesday, he posted pictures of her and losing Democratic candidates on Twitter with the hashtag #HillarysLosers.

Also damaged Tuesday was Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley (D), a long-shot presidential aspirant whose handpicked successor, Lt. Gov. Anthony G. Brown (D), was trounced by Republican businessman Larry Hogan.

Many Democrats want Clinton to put off any head-to-head combat for several months. A few advisers, however, have urged her to defy convention with a fast announcement after the midterm elections.

Clinton appears unhurried. She has said she will decide on a candidacy after Jan. 1.

Democratic strategist Steve Elmendorf, who is not advising Clinton, said she can afford to wait.

“There’s plenty of time,” he said, adding. “The reasons that some people accelerate the timetable is that they want the money” available to official candidates.

Clinton headlined Democratic events that raked in millions of dollars for others this year, and she would be expected to break fundraising records for a general election. Paul Begala, a Clinton White House adviser who remains close to both Clintons, said the couple put “money in the bank” politically with heavy schedules promoting Democrats nationwide this year.

“These two are the most popular Democrats in America, and they put that popularity on the line for folks in trouble in a bad year,” Begala said. “I am quite sure all this campaigning will put a sizable dent in Hillary’s post-State Department stratospheric poll numbers.”

Clinton said almost nothing about her four years as secretary of state while campaigning for Democrats this fall, perhaps in part because it might remind liberal voters of her hawkish foreign-policy leanings.

The post-election season will allow Clinton to address national-security issues more directly and probably to draw sharper contrasts with Obama. Clinton has gone public with her disagreement with Obama over his first-term reluctance to arm Syrian rebels and is expected to air other criticisms if she runs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That sets up a potential candidacy very much in the centrist Democratic mode that Clinton naturally inhabits, several strategists said — family checkbook issues, job and worker security, women's pay and health-care equality, plus a muscular projection of American strength abroad.

"The issues terrain in this election looks like it's going to be a very good fit for a Clinton candidacy," Burton said. "Given her experience with foreign policy and national security, and the economic issues, I think that she is particularly well suited for this moment."

But Stevens, the former Romney adviser, cast doubt on that thesis. Democrats, particularly the motivated and more liberal base voters Clinton would need in a primary season, are likely to take a bitter lesson from 2014 that would not benefit her centrist persona, he said.

"I don't think they'll look at this and say, 'These candidates didn't win because they were too liberal,' " Stevens said. "That inherent caution that Hillary Clinton has will be seen as more of the same."

New Republic: "It's Up to You Now, Hillary"

By Brian Beutler

November 5, 2014

[Subtitle:] The Republican wave puts all the pressure on Clinton to win in 2016

Tuesday night we saw what happens when polls are uniformly biased against a party that's favored to win nonetheless. Those polls get aggregated, aggregators project the likeliest outcome, and the winning party beats that projection. Before the returns came in, the overwhelming consensus was that Republicans would win the Senate, but with a one- or two-seat majority. In the end, it looks like their margin will be four.

This says less about the merits of poll aggregating than narrative-driving pundits would have you believe. But the error was nevertheless profound. The practical differences between a 51-seat GOP majority and a 54-seat GOP majority are tremendous. And the person who should be most concerned about the difference is Hillary Clinton.

The most conventional, but also most well-grounded, assumption before Tuesday night was that Republicans would win a narrow, and thus short-lived, majority. As late as 9:36 p.m. last night, conservative writer Tim Carney wrote a short article headlined "Tonight's darker omen for the GOP: Losing the Senate in 2016."

At the time, the logic was unimpeachable. Republicans would enter the presidential election cycle with a paper-thin majority, and too many vulnerable incumbents to defend.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With 54 (likely) members, Republicans don't by any means have an unbeatable majority. But for Democrats to make Mitch McConnell a one-term majority leader, they can no longer count on the 2016 map to do it for them. They'll need the turnout pattern of the last six years to repeat itself one more time, and propel Democrats to victory basically everywhere.

That presents Clinton with an immense burden. Yesterday the best bet in politics was on a Clinton presidency, a Democratic Senate and a Republican House. Today, it might be on a Clinton presidency and a Republican Congress. Whereas one day ago, Democrats had decent reasons to believe they could recapture the Senate even if Republicans won the White House in 2016, today, they must know that if a Republican wins the presidency, his party will control the entire government.

The practical differences between Clinton presiding over a divided Congress and a fully Republican Congress aren't great. The possibility that she'll be negotiating with two Republican houses instead of one shouldn't deter her or discourage any Democratic presidential hopeful.

To the contrary, the GOP's big showing yesterday ought to in some ways excite Clinton. An emboldened Republican Party is likelier than a one-vote majority to overreach, as it did in 2011, and set itself up for an unflattering contrast two years from now.

Likelier, but not guaranteed. Republicans could just as easily figure out to behave. If they do, Clinton's margin for error will be vanishingly small. No Democrat wants to lose the election that returns to power a Republican Party that has grown significantly more reactionary since they last controlled the government under George W. Bush. But those are now the stakes.

Forbes senior political contributor Rick Unger: "Hillary Clinton Wins Big In 2014 Midterm Elections"

By Rick Unger

November 5, 2014, 4:18 p.m. EST

There is certainly no getting around the fact that the 2014 midterm election was, indeed, a wave victory for the Republican Party.

How else can we possibly explain gubernatorial victories for candidates like Governor Rick Scott in Florida, Larry Hogan in Maryland and Gov. LaPage in Maine—candidates who could only have reached the winner's circle by being swept up in the GOP wave that lifted all Republican boats.

But Republicans around the nation were not the only big winners last night.

Standing, metaphysically speaking, just out of view on the many stages where Republican winners gave victory speeches and inside the hotel ballrooms where happy Republican supporters ate, drank and were merry, was the one person who may have been the biggest winner of the night—

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Yes, I am all too aware that a few candidates who were given the Clinton stamp of approval—complete with multiple campaign appearances by Bill and Hilary—went down in flames.

However, anyone who would imagine that these loses were somehow predictive of how Secretary Clinton might fare in a presidential primary race for the nomination of her party or the 2016 general election is truly deluding themselves.

It was not the Clintons who were on trial last night—it was the current occupant of the White House who was sent a message of disapproval in no uncertain terms. It was Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid who was rejected by voters throughout the nation, including a great many whom have likely never even heard of Harry Reid.

So, how does Hillary benefit from the Democrat's "Shellacking II- The Sequel"?

In case you haven't noticed, Hillary Clinton has felt the inevitable pull of moving to her left over the past few weeks. This should surprise absolutely nobody given the time-honored tradition in both parties of candidates racing to the far sides of their political party so as to please the base that shows up to vote during primaries. Once the nomination is secured, each then furiously races back toward the center where one has the best chance to win the general election and the big prize—unless, of course, you are Mitt Romney who appeared to never get the memo on this.

As a part of Clinton's commencing operation "please the liberals", she found herself saying things—such as suggesting that businesses don't create jobs—that were no doubt extremely uncomfortable for her to utter and now rest among the stack of Clinton comments she would like the opportunity to take back.

Still, such a pronouncement is not completely surprising as Clinton looks over her shoulder to see progressives who support alternative candidates, like Senator Elizabeth Warren, breathing hard down the one-time Secretary of State's neck—even as Senator Warren continues to suggest that being president is not an ambition that interests her.

But how does the hard left wing of the Democratic Party—a real concern for Mrs. Clinton two days ago–look and feel today?

If anyone out there woke up on election day believing that an Elizabeth Warren—someone whom I greatly admire—candidacy could succeed in a 2016 general election for the presidency in a country that skews right of center, it would seem sheer folly to hold onto such a belief in the more sobering light of today.

If we learned anything yesterday, it is that—while anything is possible in life—this nation is just not likely to be of a frame of mind to put a Democrat in the Oval Office in 2016 if that Democrat is perceived as coming from the far left wing of the party.

And unlike a Republican Party that fields potential presidential nominees who are more likely to be ideological purist (I refer you to the 2008 and 2012 Republican 'Caravan of Clown Candidates'), leading the party to ultimate defeat, Democrats tend to me more pragmatic in that department, understanding that it is far better to put a

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrat in the White House that may be a little too conservative for their tastes than it is to put a Republican in the big chair who is way too conservative for their taste.

As a result, last night's election results should go a long way toward taking the pressure off Mrs. Clinton to move to uncomfortable positions as more progressive Democrats realize that a challenge from Clinton's left will only force her into a losing posture.

Relieving that pressure and letting Hillary be Hillary is precisely what makes her one of the big winners of the 2014 midterm elections.

While the left-wing of the Democratic Party likes to point to the surprising nomination of a challenger to Clinton from the left in the guise of Barack Obama in 2008, and his eventual success at winning the presidency, I would caution that comparing the midterm results in 2006 to the midterm results of 2014 provides an extremely instructive lesson and sounds an important caution that Democrats should hear loud and clear.

The 2006 midterms brought a huge Democratic wave wherein the Democrats captured control of the Senate and the House of Representatives while, at the same time, taking a majority of the governorships and states legislatures away from the GOP. This was the wave, with an assist from some disasters that befell the Bush Administration, that made Barack Obama possible.

Clearly, this was not the result of last night's election where the GOP gained control of the Senate, added to their majority in the House, managed a net gain of four Republican governors where they were expected to lose a few and, yes, turned a number of state legislatures red.

The times are different and the Democratic response must be different than it was in 2008.

Last night's GOP sweep will make it easier for Hillary Clinton to remind potential challengers of this very different environment and…let me say it again…make it easier to let Hillary be Hillary.

As my friend Lanny Davis notes in his column today over at The Hill, the Bill Clinton presidency "proved there is nothing liberal about running up debt for our children and grandchildren to pay, who gave the Democratic Party the historic legacy that a progressive government can turn hundreds of billions of dollars of deficits into a surplus of nearly $1 trillion, which strengthened Social Security for this and future generations while also creating 23 million jobs that uplifted and empowered the poor and the middle class."

If that isn't a prescription for a successful Democratic candidacy in 2016, I don't know what is. And if Hillary Clinton is not the most likely person to follow in those footsteps and fill that prescription, I don't know who is.

Meanwhile, Andrew Romano of Yahoo News provides an excellent analysis of why some of the bigger wins by the Republicans last night, including some where the Clintons campaigned actively for a losing candidate, will not cause Mrs. Clinton any real harm should she be the nominee of her party in 2016.

"Let's start with the map. Sure, the GOP won a remarkable number of races last night. But take another look. How many purple states did Republicans actually pick up? There was Cory Gardner's victory in Colorado…There was Joni Ernst's victory in Iowa. And there was Thom Tillis's victory in North Carolina. The rest of the GOP's Senate flips (Montana, South Dakota, Arkansas, West Virginia) and gubernatorial flips (Arkansas, Maryland, Illinois, Massachusetts) were in states that won't really be contested in 2016. The Democrats flipped the governorship of Pennsylvania as well.'

Romano goes on to do a little math as it pertains to the 2016 presidential election:

"The math is just as bad for Republicans — and just as good for Clinton. In 2012, Mitt Romney won 59 percent of white voters, a higher share than Ronald Reagan's in 1980 and George W. Bush's in 2004. But Romney still lost to Obama. Why? Because America's minority electorate is growing every year. To hit 50.1 percent in 2016, the Republican nominee will have to win a whopping 64 percent of the white vote on Election Day — or significantly improve the party's standing among nonwhite voters, especially Hispanics. Otherwise, he or she will lose just like Romney."

Consider just how hard it will be for a Republican presidential candidate to hit a number like 64 percent of all white voters when women, with the opportunity to elect the first female president of the United States and with a history of being supportive of Democratic presidential candidates, will be among those white voters.

Frankly, the only think that would seem to be able to derail Hillary Clinton's march to the White House would be the kind of inter-party challenge from the left that would leave Clinton beaten and broken as she heads into the general election saddled with a wealth of sound bites that make her appear to be to the left of the departing President.

Last night's election results should go a long way toward warning potential Democratic opponents of Mrs. Clinton, and their supporters, of the perils of mounting a challenge more likely to make a point than produce an alternative candidate. This is particularly true given that the midterm results make clear that a New Democrat like Clinton is very much in tune with where the heart of the country can be found—liberal on social issues while conservative on fiscal matters.

And while left-wing challenges to Hillary Clinton may feel good to some Democrats, and even work to make the eventual party nominee a tougher candidate, those willing to launch such a challenge might wish to first take a look at the list of potential people who will be vying for the Republican nomination who would stand to benefit from any such challenge. I suggest this because we now know that there are lots of persuadable voters out there who have shown their willingness to do exactly that.

Inside the Clinton camp, the results of the 2014 midterms no doubt feel like a large steam valve has been turned, allowing all that left-wing pressure to release and dissipate—something that should serve the Democrats well when we arrive at the next November contest in 2016.

And while it may not quite feel like it today, make no mistake—it is Hillary Clinton who emerged from a brutal election cycle for her fellow Democrats as the big winner in the larger picture.

Reuters: "Election results could boost Republican governors, Clinton campaign for 2016"

By Gabriel Debenedetti

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

November 5, 2014, 8:36 p.m. EST

The sweeping Republican triumph in the midterm elections boosted the 2016 presidential prospects of three of the party's highest-profile governors, but Democrats on Wednesday said there also could be a silver lining for Hillary Clinton's White House hopes.

The broad Democratic losses could give the former secretary of state a chance to take over the role of party leader from a wounded President Barack Obama and sharpen her image as the Democrats' 2016 savior. The results were widely seen as more of a referendum on questions about Obama's leadership rather than a sweeping rejection of Democratic policies.

But the Republican successes also could help launch presidential campaigns for Governors John Kasich of Ohio and Scott Walker of Wisconsin, who won tough re-election battles, and Chris Christie of New Jersey, who campaigned nationally for the party as head of the Republican Governors Association.

With Tuesday's elections out of the way, the political spotlight quickly turns to the 2016 race. Clinton is the clear Democratic frontrunner, while at least a dozen possible Republican contenders are pondering a run.

Clinton's allies said Republican control of both chambers of Congress for the first time since 2006 would give her an opportunity to draw distinctions with Republicans while distancing herself from Obama.

The task of creating some distance from Obama was simplified by the resounding nature of the Republican victory on Tuesday, said Democratic consultant Hank Sheinkopf.

"People are not in love with the president today, nor should they be," he said. "It's going to be easier now."

And if Tea Party-backed conservative lawmakers like Texas Senator Ted Cruz, another potential 2016 contender, clash with the new Republican Senate leadership, Clinton could capitalize on any political fallout, allies said.

"Given the challenges of a Republican Congress and the president finding common ground, there is likely to be continued paralysis and frustration at the lack of activity in Washington to address pressing needs," said Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist who worked in Bill Clinton's White House. "By being out of office, (she) will have the ability to make clear she is not only someone with a big idea - but someone with a track record of getting things done."

CAMPAIGN-TRAIL SETBACKS

But while Clinton is a popular draw with Democrats on the campaign trail, the candidates she supported did not necessarily fare that well.

Of the 26 candidates Clinton either raised money for or appeared in public with, 12 won and 13 lost. Louisiana Senator Mary Landrieu, with whom Clinton campaigned in early November, is headed to a runoff.

Among the unsuccessful Senate candidates Clinton appeared with in the closing days of the campaign were Kay Hagan in North Carolina, Michelle Nunn in Georgia, Bruce Braley in Iowa and Alison Lundergan Grimes in Kentucky.

Also having served as Obama's secretary of state, Clinton won't always find it easy to distance herself from his image and policies.

Gleeful Republicans were quick to point out Clinton's failures and tie her to the Democratic losses.

"Today voters sent a message to Pres. Obama & Hillary Clinton, rejecting their policies & often, their candidates," tweeted Kentucky Senator Rand Paul, another likely 2016 contender.

The Republican National Committee issued a memo titled “Hillary’s Policies Were On The Ballot.”

For Republicans, victories in tough re-election races in the swing states of Wisconsin and Ohio boded well for Walker and Kasich, while Christie's RGA played a big role in several races that broke for Republicans.

“What was unexpected was how so many Republican governors won. The return of the blue state Republican governor is a story that came out of last night,” said Republican strategist Kevin Madden, in reference to the color associated with Democrats. Madden worked on the campaign of 2012 Republican nominee Mitt Romney, who lost to Obama.

Christie has used his RGA position to prove he is still politically viable after January’s Bridgegate scandal in New Jersey, during which officials close to Christie were accused of shutting lanes leading to the George Washington Bridge, causing big traffic jams, to punish a local mayor who had not endorsed Christie in the state election.

Christie's large fundraising hauls for the RGA's election campaign were complemented on Tuesday by high-profile victories in Democratic and swing states like Florida, Illinois, Michigan, Maryland, and Massachusetts.

Appearing on five morning television shows on Wednesday, a happy Christie swatted away questions about what the wins might mean for his national ambitions.

“It’s way off, and my view on all this is that my job this year was to elect Republican governors and re-elect Republican governors,” he said on CBS. He has raised $106 million for the group since taking over in November 2013, the RGA said.

Madden said the victories would be useful for Christie in proving his political value, if not necessarily in appealing to Republican primary voters.

Walker, meanwhile, won his third consecutive expensive and high-profile race in a Democrat-leaning state, while Kasich won by a 31-point margin in a state often considered the most important in presidential contests.

No senator who is considering a White House bid was up for re-election on Tuesday, and Representative Paul Ryan of Wisconsin, the lone House of Representatives member seen as a likely candidate in 2016, easily kept

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: “Ryan: Midterms show Clinton 'not inevitable'”

By Peter Sullivan

November 5, 2014, 5:38 p.m. EST

Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) said Wednesday that the election results mean Hillary Clinton is "not inevitable."

Radio host Hugh Hewitt asked Ryan about Clinton's heavy campaigning for Democratic Senate candidates who went on to lose.

"It just tells you that she’s not inevitable," replied Ryan, a possible 2016 opponent of Clinton's. "I think she’s very beatable. I really do."

He went on to point to Clinton's record as secretary of State. "She’s the architect of the Obama foreign policy for the first four years, and look at how awful that is," Ryan said.

He also reached back to Bill Clinton's presidency. "When she was a policymaker, when her husband was president, her signature issue was single-payer healthcare, I mean to the left of ObamaCare," he said.

The Clintons' proposal to Congress was for an employer mandate to provide health insurance to employees, not a single-payer system. Their plan died in Congress.

Ryan is not the only potential presidential contender to use the midterms to go after Clinton. Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said Tuesday night that the results meant Clinton was "soundly rejected."

"If we can focus in the next two years on unifying, and bringing people into the fold, into the tent, winning converts, instead of focusing on shooting at each other, than I really think we can become a majority movement in this country," Ryan said.

Hewitt then asked if Ryan was basically announcing a run for president.

"No, I’m just announcing what we have to do as conservatives," Ryan replied.

National Journal: “Elizabeth Warren's Supporters See Vindication in Dems' 2014 Debacle”

By Emily Schultheis

November 5, 2014

Don't blame Elizabeth Warren for the Democrats' midterm defeat. Follow her back to victory.

That's the message progressives have for their fellow Democrats after Tuesday's widespread losses. Warren's supporters say the party fell short because it failed to emphasize the Massachusetts senator's message of economic populism—and that pushing that message is the road back to congressional control.

"Elizabeth Warren was the most popular Democrat on the campaign trail this cycle—in red states, purple states, and blue states," said Adam Green, cofounder of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee. "And that's because her economic populist message ... resonates everywhere."

It's just an initial shot, but it's a sign of things to come. As the party autopsies its 2014 loss, factions promise to further fracture as they debate what went wrong, who's to blame, and where to go next. And for progressives, that means a concerted effort to pull the party to the left.

But for the movement to gain traction, it needs a high-profile candidate for the 2016 presidential contest, someone who would run to the left of Hillary Clinton. Warren is the obvious choice, but she has repeatedly said she won't run.

With Democrats on the outs in Congress, however, those calls promise to get louder.

Warren's allies point to Tuesday night's results as proof that their preferred candidate has national appeal.

Warren hit the trail for Democratic candidates across the map this year, in deep-blue states like Oregon and red ones like West Virginia and Kentucky. She spoke about economic populism issues such as the minimum wage, fixing student-debt problems, and expanding Social Security, a message that worked in states across the ideological spectrum.

While Republicans immediately jumped on both President Obama and Hillary Clinton as the major losers of the night, Warren appeared to have a better track record in the races where she personally campaigned for candidates.

Plenty of candidates whom Warren campaigned for, including Martha Coakley in Warren's home state of Massachusetts, lost their races Tuesday: Warren backed many of the same Democrats in tight races that other top party surrogates did, and Democratic hopefuls Alison Lundergan Grimes in Kentucky and Natalie Tennant in West Virginia, for example, lost by huge margins.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But progressives tout the easy victories for other Warren-endorsed Democrats, including Sens. Al Franken of Minnesota, Jeff Merkley of Oregon, and Brian Schatz of Hawaii, as proof that Warren's policies are successful on the ballot. (Those candidates were all heavy favorites anyway, so it's a stretch to assign Warren responsibility for their victories, but the correlation—at least—is there.)

Democracy for America, another progressive group that's among Warren's biggest cheerleaders, sent an email to its supporters touting Warren-esque candidates like Merkley and Schatz.

"The bright spots in this election come from candidates who understood that the path to victory is to run hard on a populist progressive economic vision—Elizabeth Warren's vision for fighting and winning across America," the email said.

On the issues, allies note that Warren's positions won out in some red states even if Democratic candidates there didn't. Minimum-wage measures passed in four states—Alaska, Arkansas, South Dakota, and Nebraska—even as voters there favored Republican Senate candidates (in Alaska, Democratic Sen. Mark Begich is trailing his GOP opponent, though the race hasn't been called yet).

Charles Chamberlain, DFA's executive director, said the fact that minimum-wage measures passed even as Democratic candidates fell in some states shows that Warren's messaging and stand on issues could have helped Democrats who ultimately lost on Tuesday.

"Look, the same voters [who] voted to raise minimum wage in South Dakota voted to elect [Republican] Mike Rounds," he said. "The problem isn't what we stand for, it's who stands for us. Those Democrats [who lost] were not strong enough on our issues."

So are the results of the midterms enough to make Warren reconsider a presidential run? It was a rough night for Clinton—and as Republicans jump on her midterm record ahead of 2016, there could be an opening for a Democrat who's seen as more of an outsider. And for Warren, who will soon be in the minority in the Senate, seeking national office would certainly give her a bigger platform to compensate for her diminished clout in the upper chamber.

"If I were Sen. Warren I'd be thinking about, what is the strongest way for me to advocate for the change I believe we need to see in America?" Chamberlain said. "When you think about it—languishing in the minority versus leading the entire country—I think that's a real strong calculation she's going to have to make."

Erica Sagrans, the treasurer for the draft-Warren group Ready for Warren, which is ramping up its activities on behalf of the senator (and with which Warren has denied all involvement), said Tuesday's result "does change the calculation" for Warren because a presidential bid could "give more of a voice to her ideas and values."

Regardless, supporters say she'll have a role in shaping the overall Democratic message in 2016 no matter what her decision is—and that her influence on Clinton, for example, is already clear.

"Honestly, I don't know," Green said. "I do believe her current intent is not to run—but that's not to say that she has no role in the 2016 election."

Daily Caller: “With Eyes On Rand And Hillary, John Bolton Says He Is Mulling Presidential Bid”

By Alex Pappas

November 5, 2014, 4:23 p.m. EST

John Bolton, the former U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, tells The Daily Caller he is considering a run for president in 2016 as a Republican.

“I have not decided,” Bolton said in an interview. “And I don’t have a timetable on that.”

But Bolton, who flirted with running in 2012, expressed a desire for a Republican presidential candidate who is capable of taking on likely Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on national security issues.

“Obviously, if the Democrats nominate Hillary,” he said, “her principle ‘qualification’ is her time as secretary of state. So being able to dissect and explain to the voters why she fails as a leader, I think is going to be critical for whomever is interested in the Republican nomination.”

He also suggested he’s partly driven to consider a run because of the rising influence of “isolationism” in the party.

“I don’t think I have to make a decision as early as some others do,” Bolton said, “but I do think the threat of isolationism is still there in the party. And I think that’s something that is of very much concern to me.”

Asked if he was referring to the libertarian-leaning Sen. Rand Paul, who is also expected to run for president, Bolton said: “I don’t personalize it so much.”

But Bolton went on to question whether Paul shares the same views on foreign policy as his father, former Texas Ron Paul. He was expressed incredulity about how Ron Paul recently gave an interview to “Russian state television” and said America doesn’t have “true democracy.”

“It’s just unbelievable,” Bolton said.

(In that interview, Ron Paul said: “Here at home, we don’t have true democracy. We have a monopoly of ideas that is controlled by the leaders of two parties. And they call it two parties, but it’s really one philosophy.”)

Bolton suggested Rand Paul will have to answer for statements like that made by his father.

“Ok, so does Rand Paul agree with that?” Bolton said. “We don’t really have true democracy here? I’d like to know the answer to that. This is the threat of isolationism. I think what you hear from Ron Paul is what the isolationist think, and so just asking his son what he thinks of everything his father says could be a full time business."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bolton said he plans to observe who gets in the presidential race, but for now, he's not very satisfied with those often mentioned as likely candidates.

"Honestly," he said, "I don't see yet in the field — or of the people the great mentioner in the sky mentions — anybody who is really prepared to address the national security issues in the comprehensive way I hope they will be. Now, we don't know who is in and who is out yet, so I want to see a little bit of what happens."

More immediately, Bolton said he plans to continue ramping up his activities in the John Bolton PAC and SuperPAC. For the midterms, his PACs raised a combined $7.5 million. He endorsed 87 Republican candidates, contributed $470,000 directly to campaigns and spent $5 million on advertising.

Speaking of the midterm election results, which gave Republicans a majority in the Senate, Bolton said: "I think it was an overwhelming rejection of the president's policies, but I think what was particularly interesting was the role that national security played in both in several specific elections but more broadly across the country."

He specifically mentioned three GOP Senate candidates — Tom Cotton of Arkansas, Joni Ernst of Iowa and Thom Tillis of North Carolina — who he supported and won.

"I think where candidates — either because of their own backgrounds or their beliefs — stressed national security, they tended to do very well," Bolton said.

"I think the general concern across the country that the Obama administration was not protecting America — whether it is from international terrorism or border security or Ebola or just in general the impression the world was getting more disorderly and therefore more threatening — it was a very powerful theme across the country," Bolton said.

Part of Bolton's efforts are aimed at showing candidates that people do care about national security.

"Political operative have been wrong for so long," he said. "You know, they say, 'oh foreign affairs are so distant from people's everyday lives and doesn't affect them.' I give American voters more credit."

"I just think they're practical people," he said. "They know they're not going to get involved in the intricacies of some foreign crisis — that's what they expect the people they send to Washington to do — but what they expect from the people they send to Washington, the president especially, is to be able to resolve these problems in a way that protects America and its people and its interest. And so when they see that not happening, or fear that it's not happening, they equate it with a failure of leadership, and they respond accordingly."

McCain Speaks on Impending Biopsy, Energy and Drilling (CNN 07/28/08 3:05pm)
JOHN MCCAIN: ... oil production at a high level, including off-shore drilling. Now, in briefings that I've had with the oil producers, there are some instances within a matter of months they could be getting additional oil. In some cases, it would be a matter of a year.

In some cases, it could take longer than that, depending on the location and whether you use existing rigs or you have to install new rigs. But there's abundant resources in the view of the people who are in the business that could be exploited within a period of months.

So off-shore drilling is something we have to do. I'm sorry that Senator Obama opposes it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nuclear power is not only vital, I think, to clean energy and reduction of greenhouse gas emissions, but nuclear power also is a way to employ hundreds of thousands of Americans. We can build 45 new nuclear power plants by the year 2030. It would employ some 700,000 people.

So Senator Obama opposes off-shore drilling. He opposes reprocessing of spent nuclear fuel. He opposes storage of spent nuclear fuel. And so he is the Dr. No of the America's energy future. And he also opposes a gas tax holiday as a gimmick.

So I'm very pleased to be here. Again, we'll be talking about energy and the economy and continue to do so.

And, by the way, I -- as I do every three months, visited my dermatologist this morning. She said that I was doing fine, took a small little nick from my cheek, as she does regularly, and that will be and will be biopsied, just to make sure that everything is fine.

But I want to, again, urge all Americans to wear sunscreen, particularly this summer. Stay out of the sun as much as possible. Wear sunscreen. And if you ever have any slight discoloration, please go to your dermatologist or your doctor and get it checked up on.

Melanoma is a preventable occurrence. It really is. It's one of the most preventable occurrences. But, remember, a lot of the damage that people receive from the sun when they're young sometimes comes back later in life. And that's the end of my lecture from the American Dermatology Association today.

Thank you all very much. Thank you.

QUESTION: Senator, your doctor was confident that there was nothing major?

MCCAIN: Absolutely.

Highlight #2
Nancy Pfotenhauer's Responses on Deficit Questions Leave Wolf Blitzer Unsatisfied (CNN 07/28/ 08 4:30pm)
WOLF BLITZER: […] among other things that the Obama campaign, Nancy, said today, Senator McCain is proposing to continue the same Bush economic policies that put our economy on this dangerous path and that will drive America even deeper into debt. What is he going to do differently than President Bush has done all these years to reduce this enormous deficit?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Well, spending, spending, spending. Senator McCain has been a leader in the U.S. senate and Laura knows this, trying to hold the line on federal spending. What wasn't discussed earlier is the fact that Barack Obama has midwifed this as much as anyone else.

BLITZER: I want to hear what McCain is going to do to cut the deficit.

PFOTENHAUER: Certainly, Senator McCain has proposed do a top to bottom review of the federal government and all spending programs. There will be consolidation and elimination. He's proposed to eliminate pork barrel spending and Senator Obama proposed about $900 million of that in a brief period of time that he's been in the U.S. Senate, that's I mean by he's part of the problem—

BLITZER: You know, Nancy that, pork barrel spending is something significant but a relatively tiny percentage of the federal budget.

PFOTENHAUER: It's important to stop that, though, Wolf. In addition to that, Senator McCain is going to put in place spending disciplines like a constitutionally viable line item veto, enhanced ability to stop this tremendous spending growth by forcing congress to enroll each provision separately so he could veto each provision. Keep in mind how we got here, an energy bill, a farm bill, a highway bill that is worth hundreds of billions of dollars.

[cross-talk]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BLITZER: You're neglecting to mention about $700 billion spent on the war in Iraq, money that could have been spent here at home.

PFOTENHAUER: Well, and it's important to focus on why where that money would go in the future, since both candidates are agreeing there's going to be a troop drawdown, if you will, one important distinction between Senator McCain and Senator Obama, Senator McCain said since this war has been financed with deficit spending, as the troop drawdown occurs every penny of that needs to go to deficit reduction. Senator Obama has done nothing but lip service on deficit reduction. Senator McCain has said, "I will balance this budget by the end of my first term."

BLITZER: Let me let Nancy respond to the one serious accusation you made against Senator McCain. He opposed the bush tax cuts in 2001, opposed them in 2003, and now says they have to be made permanent, forever. That's going to increase the budget deficit, if you were to eliminate some of those tax cuts that presumably would reduce the budget deficit, right, Nancy?

PFOTENHAUER: Keep in mind; keep in mind he opposed the tax cuts because he said they needed to be accompanied with spending reductions. If they had been accompanied by spending reductions, we would not be in the situation that we're in right now. Also, keep in mind that, for most of the last eight years, revenues have been running at about 18.8% of GDP. That is slightly above historic historical averages.

I will agree with Laura on one thing, that the economic downturn has now become part of, if you will, this equation and therefore, revenues are sliding but I would argue that that's because the market has recognized a couple of things. One, Senator Obama, who is a potential president of the United States, he's not going to get there, but he's a potential president of the United States, is actively promising tax increases on income, on cap gains, on increasing the amount of wages subject to the payroll taxes, lower corporate tax rates, won't lower the corporate tax rate.

BLITZER: Unfortunately we have to leave it there. I will add one thing, Nancy, when he opposed the tax cuts in 2001 and 2003, he also said they were skewed toward the wealthy. He didn't like that and also said at the time of war you don't start cutting taxes, that's what he said at the time but he's got a different sense right now. We have to leave it right there, a good discussion, serious discussion. I'm still not hearing a lot from either one of you about how this budget deficit is about to be cut, but we'll leave that for the next occasion, Nancy, and Laura, thanks to you.

Pfotenhauer Supports McCain's New Attack Ad and Touts His Econ Platform (MSNBC, 07/28/08, 12:20pm)
CONTESSA BREWER: The Obama campaign points out Nancy, that Barack Obama went to visit the wounded troops in Iraq and he didn't bring cameras, do you think that ad reflects well on your candidate?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: I think it showcases the differences between these two gentlemen. Senator McCain, for his whole life, not just his time in the senate, but obviously his time in the military has shown that he loves his country and puts it first at the cost of political or personal well being. And with Senator Obama, I think his actions in canceling a scheduled visit with wounded troops just calls into question kind of his judgment and his priorities, frankly. And that carries over, not just from when he has had to say about foreign policy and you almost have to check your watch to see what he's saying today, because most of his statements have an expiration date. But if you translate it over into the domestic policy front, things like energy where he refuses to embrace easy answers to increasing our domestic production in order to ease the pain for Americans who are facing higher energy prices, he won't embrace drilling, he won't embrace natural gas.

BREWER: Because the experts say that even if we open up all the offshore drilling it really won't do anything to wean us off our foreign dependence. And that is why Barack Obama says he doesn't support a Federal gas tax holiday. That being said, when you have John McCain in another ad, basically blaming Barack Obama for high gas prices, again, McCain wants to be the straight shooter. Do you think these kind of campaign ads line up with a straight shooter?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

PFOTENHAUER: He's telling the American people the truth. When you look at Senator Obama's energy plan, let's just talk about that for right now, he has no plan to increase domestic production. That is reckless and irresponsible given the situation that we're facing. He doesn't endorse drilling, he doesn't endorse natural gas, he wants to tax coal, he doesn't even have a real role for nuclear power which is embraced by at least 8 other countries. It's safe and it's clean. so, he has this real piecemeal, pie in the sky plan on energy that does nothing to help people now or in five years.

BREWER: I know American families want to hear what the candidates have to say about their economic future, what they're going to do. […] So taxes aren't off the table, but Frank Donatelli says, no, no, never taxes. Which is it?

PFOTENHAUER: What Senator McCain's plan shows is that he's going to reduce taxes and keep them low on capital formation or the job producing sector of the economy and lower federal spending. And that's really one of the key difference. Senator Obama's plan calls for dramatically increasing taxes in income, raising the cap on wages subject to the payroll tax. He's going to let the cap gains tax bump back up and he's going to do nothing for our corporate tax rate, and that really hinders our international competitiveness at the same time he's increasing taxes, and he's increasing spending by about a trillion dollars. So higher taxes and higher spending, recipe for a recession.

Frank Donatelli Supports McCain's New Attack Ad and His Economic Strategies (MSNBC, 07/28/08, 10:30am)
CONTESSA BREWER: What's your response to what Obama's campaign says, that this new ad is inappropriate and dishonorable?

FRANK DONATELLI: You know, it's funny. This is about the fifth different reason that you just heard from the gentleman as to why he canceled his trip. This is first that we've heard that there's an individual that wanted to come along that they wanted to bring and the defense department wouldn't let them. They never mentioned that before. And they're also trying the defense department under the bus, for heaven's sakes. It comes back to a question of judgment, Contessa. They didn't have time to do this, but they had time to visit a couple hundred thousand citizens of the world.

BREWER: Let's talk about the judgment on the economy. It now appears that Barack Obama is ready to focus on the economy, of course, McCain last week at the time when Barack Obama was overseas he was -- McCain was in grocery stores, looking at the prices of eggs and that now very famous photo-op. do you think that he has settled on an economic message that resonates with voters?

DONATELLI: Yes, absolutely. In a time of economic weakness, no higher taxes. You never, ever raise taxes when the economy is weak. Senator Obama has promised to raise every single tax. Senator McCain is going to keep taxes low. Secondly, energy prices. Senator Obama does not have a plan. All he favors is having energy prices go higher and higher. Senator McCain believes in more domestic oil and gas supplies, which will eventually moderate the price. Very clear difference between the two candidates.

CBS Evening News Examines McCain's Economic and Energy Plans (NBC, 07/28/08, 6:55pm)
CHIP REID: John McCain has also surrounded himself with some of the best minds in business, including Carly Fiorina, former CEO of HewlettPackard, and Meg Whitman, former head of Ebay. Today they briefed reporters on the importance of cutting taxes on business to create jobs.

CARLY FIORINA: Small business is the engine of growth in this economy.

REID: McCain says he'll balance the budget by the end of his first term, but critics wonder how that's possible givin his support for extending all of the Bush tax cuts. As important as jobs and taxes are, polls show it's the price of gas that really gets voters mad. That's where McCain kept his focus today as he toured an oil field in California.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: So offshore drilling is something we have to do.

REID: McCain says he now supports increased offshore drilling, as do 73 percent of Americans, because he says more oil supplies will bring prices down. He says it's time for Obama to get on board.

MCCAIN: He is the doctor no of America's energy future.

REID: But Obama says offshore drilling harms the environment, and looks to the past not the future. […] There are now so many economic challenges confronting the nation that as one key senator put it today, whoever is the next president will have a very, very sobering first week.

Highlight #3
John McCain's Lobbyists Under Scrutiny (CNN 07/28/08 8:46pm)
JOE JOHNS: John McCain and the lobbyists is a story that won't go way. That is partly because the democrats like to talk about it so much. When you're following the lobbying game, it's all about money and who gets access to power. To hear John McCain tell it, he's your guy in Washington fighting against the unchecked influence of big businesses and their lobbyists.

JOHN MCCAIN: The workers and entrepreneurs of America are taken for granted by their government while the lobbyists and special pleaders are seldom turned away.

JOHNS: Those lobbyists often kick in top dollar to gain top access to the highest corridors of power, right? Sure. How does that McCain rhetoric square with this: a fancy 2006 soiree of the little known, but well-respected International Republican Institute in Washington, the video from the group's own website shows the chairman of AT&T, which had just donated $200,000 to the institute introducing none other than John McCain, who was still chairman of the institute's board. Remember, at the time, McCain was fresh off of the term as the chairman of the senate committee that regulates telephone companies like AT&T. AT&T says there were no strings attached to the donation but that's not always the point.

LARRY SABATO: Access this is name of the game. It's getting in the door to see your candidate so you can make your case. Sometimes you don't even need to see the candidate, just talk to staff members, the people who influence the candidate's decision.

JOHNS: Okay, so which is it? Will the real John McCain please stand up? Is he the scourge of a system in Washington that rewards lobbyists and their wealthy bosses or is he the guy who hob-knobs with and therefore might somehow be influenced by the very interest he says he's trying to root out? Answer: both.

Smart politicians know tough talk on lobbyists sounds good to the public. The reality is players at this level can't live without them.

SABATO: They know they work with lobbyists, they have staffers who have been lobbyists, they are going to depend on lobbyists for a lot of information for the decisions they make if they get elected. So absolutely, there's a lot of hypocrisy involved.

JOHNS: The group, IRI that held the event McCain attended gets just about all its money from the federal government to do things like promote democracy around the world and help governments run more efficiently. It's a cause McCain believes in.

A former IRI staffer who also worked for the last McCain presidential campaign says that while the IRI event may have brought McCain and the lobbyist together, there was never any kind of a quid pro quo.

TODD HARRIS: The important question is are those lobbyists getting anything, any special favors or privileges for their donations? In the case of Senator McCain in general and IRI specifically, there's never been a single time someone gave money and said, 'This is what I want in exchange.'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CAMPBELL BROWN: […] I have to ask, with all this talk about clearing out the lobbyist, McCain has also gotten a lot of criticism over his campaign manager, Rick Davis who was a former lobbyist.

JOHNS: That's right and there are some other former lobbyists as well, you know; a variety of people. You might even need a scorecard to keep up with all of them. The democrats say McCain is tainted by this. The republicans say he's completely above it. He's put in—actually—a conflicts policy to try to tell people who are actually paid by the campaign that they can't work actively as a lobbyist but this story tends to dog him […].

[…]

CAMPBELL BROWN: […] McCain, after he became the Republican nominee, said he was gonna take this dramatic step, purging his campaign staff of anyone with lobbyist ties. Several staffers did leave, but […] Rick Davis, his campaign manager: former lobbyist, still there; Charlie Black: former lobbyist now, still in a senior advisor position. I mean, a lot of parsing. You're either okay with lobbyists, or you're not, right?

McCain Voting Hypocrisy: Record Shows Lack of Support in Voting for Veterans and Troops (MSNBC 07/28/08 8:20pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: […] The latest McCain campaign ad made an even more outlandish claim quote, "John McCain is always there for our troops." Except when he isn't. As Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid noted in mid 2007, McCain only showed up for four of the past 14 Senate votes on Iraq. So far this year he's shown for none. Not even the resolution honoring the sacrifice made by the fallen.

In looking at just part of McCain's record of supporting the troops since the war in Iraq began, in April 2003 he tabled a motion to provide over a billion dollars of national guard and reserve equipment. October 2003, he tabled then an amendment to provide an additional 322 million dollars for safety equipment for U.S. troops in Iraq. March 2004, he voted against eliminating abusive tax loopholes that would have increased veteran's medical care by 1.8 billion dollars. March 20006, he voted against closing corporate tax loopholes that would have increased veteran's medical services by 1.5 billion dollars. April 2006, he voted against providing an extra 430 million dollars for veteran outpatient care. May, 2006 he voted against 20 million dollars for veteran healthcare facilities. March 2007, he didn't bother to vote on a resolution to start redeploying troops from Iraq by March 2008. September 2007, he voted against Senator Webb's amendment that would specify minimum rest periods for troops in between deployments. And in May 2008 he first spoke out against Senator Webb's GI bill and then didn't bother to show up to vote on it. But none of that stopped him from accepting President Bush's praise when the bill ultimately passed.

If you go after your opponent for not supporting the troops, when your own record is pretty clearly indicative that you do not support the troops, do you not provoke people to look at your own record like we just did?

RACHEL MADDOW: I've long said, and you've been saying this too, that there is a fascinating candidacy for the presidency happening right now, if people could just pay attention to it for a hot minute. John McCain can't hold the press's interest for long enough to get this kind of scrutiny in very many media venues. His campaign is counting on, and I think they've been right to count on so far, the idea that if you kind of squint and don't focus too much, the fact that he is a veteran can sort of substitute for the idea that he has done right by veterans as a politician, that he's done right by veterans and by the troops as a Senator. But the fact is, Iraq and Afghanistan veterans of America they gave John McCain a D for his voting record, they gave Barack Obama a B+. Disabled American Veterans gave John McCain just a 20 percent voting record, they gave Barack Obama an 80 percent voting record. There's a difference between being a veteran and supporting veterans as a politician, he's just counting on people not being able to tell the difference.

New Poll Shows McCain Ahead of Obama, But Does It Count? (MSNBC 07/28/08 5:40pm)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MIKE BARNACLE: Whenever these polls are released, and they're released almost on an hourly basis now, there are always two things that are pointed out. One is, Barack Obama seems unable, thus far, to crack 50 percent in the polls. And yet John McCain seems unable, thus far, to crack 45 in the polls. What do you make of that?

WAYNE SLATER: Let me say something that may be a little counterintuitive, and that's that we got a poll that shows John McCain ahead. As Michelle said, it's the first time in any poll we've seen in this campaign. But I really think it's not good news for John McCain. It's not bad news to be ahead, but it's not good news. Basically, people know who John McCain is, he hasn't made the sale. He can't go above 45 at least so far. Barack Obama is still largely unknown, in the larger sense of things, and he hasn't completely made the sale, but I think the opportunity for growth is there with Barack Obama. To go back to the cliché we've heard again and again, this is Barack Obama's race to lose. A referendum on his race. If he stays ahead, as in other polls, then I think he wins.

Media Bias Investigated: More Negative Obama Coverage, Press Takes It Easy on McCain (MSNBC 07/28/08 6:07pm)
RACHEL MADDOW: There is such thing as bad press. Much has been made in the past couple of weeks about the disproportionate media coverage that Obama is getting as compared to John McCain. Indeed, Andrew Tindle's online Tindle report found that Obama was getting almost twice as much network news coverage as McCain. But now George Mason University has looked into not just how much the networks are saying about each candidate, but what they're saying, and it turns out that 72 percent of the opinionated statements on Obama on network coverage were negative. The networks were 15 points kinder, more favorable to John McCain then they were to Obama. It's not just the quantity of coverage, it's the quality. And that means, I think, I'm not sure that John McCain's campaign has much to complain about in terms of their press coverage right now.

DAVID GREGORY: Are you surprised that McCain's still getting the buzz, the glow from 2000?

MADDOW: He's just not getting very much attention at all. And the coverage that he is getting is sort of rounding him up in sort of a nice, hazy, soft focused way based on his 2000 impression. People just aren't taking a hard look at him and they're not being tough on him.

McCain's Vice Presidential Candidate Options Down to a Shortlist (NBC Nightly News, 07/28/08, 7:11pm)
BRIAN WILLIAMS: And back home, the U.S. political clock is ticking down towards this summer's party conventions. By the time they take to the stage, Obama and McCain will have running mates selected. We're getting awfully close to selection time for both of them, you can tell that from the amount of speculation that's flying around Washington.

DAVID GREGORY: For Obama and McCain it's the most presidential decision of the race, and by all accounts they are closing in on a number two.

Republican sources close to McCain say he appears to be down to a shortlist of three. Mitt Romney, former Congressman and Bush administration official Rob Portman, and Minnesota Governor Tim Pawlenty with whom McCain is said to have good chemistry. But might McCain try someone more unconventional, like the pro-abortion rights former governor of Pennsylvania Tom Ridge?

The base wouldn't like it but those swing voters, those white independent women, those Hillary supporters who may decide this election, I think they'd like Tom Ridge and I think the two of them would play really strong.

A lot of the buzz now is not just who but when. This is a decision that can change the dynamic of a campaign.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Rally in Pottsville, PA 10/27/08

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Jacob, on the ground in Pottsville. Below are the notes from our call.

Big Highlights

- Says Obama is running to be Redistributionist in Chief. I'm running to be Commander in Chief.
- Repeats (slimmed-down) attack on Obama for saying in a radio interview that one of the "tragedies" of the civil rights movement is that it didn't bring about "redistributive change."
    - Says Obama said that even though lower taxes on investment help our economy, he favors higher taxes on investment for "fairness" -- "There's nothing "fair" about driving our economy into the ground."
    - Repeats that Obama's more interested in controlling wealth than in creating it
- Scoffs at Obama for saying we should look at environmental concerns, etc. when considering nuclear power

Pottsville, PA: McCain Rally 10/27/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- about 4000 ppl, VERY enthusiastic crowd
- Tracker saw about 30 demonstrators outside pre-event yelling 'Tell Your Mama Vote Obama!'
- State Reps. Gary Hornberger and Dave Argall give brief intro remarks: Obama will tax and spend
- Cindy intros mccain
    - you make my heart so warm
    - when we started on this 18mo. ago it was a family affair [someone yells cindy's hot?]
    - we had a vested interest in iraq - our son was there
    - leadership and character to be pres - he has always put his country first
    - lived his life by code of conduct - duty honor - what a wonderful pres. he'll make

Speech Highlights

TY. wont cindy make a great FLOTUS? and wont palin make a great VP? shes smart, tough, reformer, wonderful family person and she'll take on old boy netwrk of DC. ty for your enthusiastic support of her. Todd is 4x snow mobile champ. think anyone in DC coudl scare him or her?

lets start out with a msg tonight: we need to win PA. i need your help over next 8 days so we can bring real change to DC.

some ST: we cant spend next 4 yrs as weve spent last 8. we have to act, we need a new direction and we have to fight for it. ive been fighting ofr this country since i was 17 and i ahve the scars to prove it.

I have a plan to hold the line on taxes and cut them to make America more competitive and create jobs here at home. no one knows better than you in PA how badly we need to create jobs and get our econ. going again. We're going to double the child deduction for working families. We will cut the capital gains tax. And we will cut business taxes to help create jobs, and keep American businesses in America. [john mccain! john mccain!]

Raising taxes makes a bad economy much worse. Keeping taxes low creates jobs, keeps money in your hands and strengthens our economy.

If I'm elected President, I won't spend nearly a trillion dollars more of your money. Senator Obama will. And he can't do that without raising your taxes or digging us further into debt. I'm going to make government live on a budget just like you do.

I will freeze government spending on all but the most important programs like defense, veterans care, Social Security and health care until we scrub every single government program and get rid of the ones that aren't working for the American people. And I will veto every single pork barrel bill Congresses passes. DNA of bears or whatever - you will know their names, i will make them famous.

I'm not going to spend $750 billion dollars of your money just bailing out the Wall Street bankers and brokers who got us into this mess. I'm going to make sure we take care of the working people who were devastated by the excesses of Wall Street and Washington.

I have a plan to fix our housing market, so that your home value doesn't go down when your neighbor defaults, and so that people in danger of defaulting have a path to pay off their loan. so that ppl can achieve american dream of owning a home.

If I'm elected-- when im elected President, we're going to stop spending $700 billion to buy oil from countries that don't like us very much.

in the debate the other night, i talked about how much i admired obama's rhetoric. but you listen to whats behind his words. he said he would "consider" offshore drilling. we talked about nucl, and he said well you have to consider the enviro, and -- that's right, drill baby drill. We will invest in all energy alternatives -- nuclear, wind, solar, and tide. We will encourage the manufacture of hybrid, flex fuel and electric automobiles. We will invest in clean coal technology. let me remind you: the USA sits on worlds largest coal reserves - we can do clean coal and create millions of jbos. i see a few old navy vets - there's 1 from my old ship - we've sailed navy ships around the world w/ nucl plants on them. the french, the japanese, the british. they store and reprocess. 80% of french energy comes from nuclear. We will lower the cost of energy within months, and we will create millions of new jobs. millions you know, We've learned more about Senator Obama's real goals for our country over the last two weeks than we learned over the past two years, and that only because Joe the plumber asked him a question in Ohio. That's when Senator Obama revealed -- but not for the first time -- he wants to quote "spread the wealth around."

Now, Joe didn't ask for Senator Obama to come to his house, and he didn't ask to be famous. He certainly didn't ask for the political attacks on him from the Obama campaign. Joe's dream is your dream -- to own a small business that will create jobs, and the attacks on him are an attack on small businesses all over the country. Small businesses employ 84 percent of Americans, and we need to support small businesses, not tax them.

After months of campaign trail eloquence, we've finally learned what Senator Obama's economic goal is: to spread the wealth. In a radio interview revealed today, he said the same thing -- that one of the "tragedies" of the civil rights movement is that it didn't bring about "redistributive change."

You see, Senator Obama believes in redistributing wealth, not in policies that grow our economy and create jobs. He said that even though lower taxes on investment help our economy, he favors higher taxes on investment for quote "fairness." There's nothing "fair" about driving our economy into the ground. We all suffer when that happens, and that is the problem with Senator Obama's approach to our economy. He is more interested in controlling wealth than in creating it ... in redistributing money instead of spreading opportunity. I am going to create wealth for all Americans, by creating opportunity for all Americans.

Senator Obama is running to be Redistributionist in Chief. I'm running to be Commander in Chief. Senator Obama is running to spread the wealth. I'm running to create more wealth. Senator Obama is running to punish the successful. I'm running to make everyone successful.

My opponent's massive new tax increase is exactly the wrong approach in an economic slowdown. The answer to a slowing economy is not higher taxes, but that is exactly what is going to happen when the Democrats have total control of Washington. [boos, someone yells something about "spending!"] We can't let that happen. We need pro-growth and pro-jobs economic policies, not pro-government spending programs paid for with higher taxes.

This is the fundamental difference between Senator Obama and me. We both disagree with President Bush on economic policy. The difference is that he thinks taxes have been too low, and I think that spending has been too high.

If we are going to change Washington, we need a President who has actually fought for change and male it happen. The next President won't have time to get used to the office. We face many challenges here at home, and many enemies abroad in this dangerous world. i will bring our troops home in victory and honor and not in defeat.

just the other day, a couple days ago, Senator Biden warned a group of fatcat contributors out on the W. Coast -- he warned us that Senator Obama would be tested with an international crisis. I have been tested. Senator Obama hasn't. i know how to work with our friends and i know how to treat our enemies. biden is the gift that keeps on giving.

Senator Biden referred to how Jack Kennedy was tested in the Cuban Missile Crisis and I have a little personal experience in that. I was on board the U.S.S. Enterprise, and I sat in a cockpit on the flight deck waiting to take off. We had a target. I know how close we came to a nuclear war and I will not be a president that needs to be tested.

We know Senator Obama won't have the right response to that test, because we've seen the wrong response from him over and over during this campaign. He opposed the surge strategy that is bringing us victory in Iraq and will bring us victory in Afghanistan. He said he would sit down unconditionally with the world's worst dictators. [boos] When Russia invaded Georgia, Sen. Obama said the invaded country should show restraint. He's been wrong on all of these. When I am president, we are going to win in Iraq and win in Afghanistan, and our troops will come home in victory and honor.

Let me give you a little straight talk. Let me give you the state of the race today. There's eight days to go. We're a few points down. The pundits have written us off, just like they've done before. My opponent is working out the details with Speaker Pelosi and Senator Reid of their plans [boos] to raise your taxes, increase spending, and concede defeat in Iraq. He's measuring the drapes, and he's planned his first address to the nation for before the election. [yelling, incl. "let the ppl have a vote!"] I guess I'm old fashioned about these things -- I prefer to let the voters weigh in before presuming the outcome.

What America needs now is someone who will finish the race before the starting the victory lap, someone who will fight to the end, and not for himself but for his country.

I have fought for you most of my life, and in places where defeat meant more than returning to the Senate. [yelling] There are other ways to love this country, but I've never been the kind to back down when the stakes are high.

let me just say to you, I know you're worried. [yelling] America is a great country, but we are at a moment of national crisis that will determine our future.

Let me ask you a few questions real quickly. Will we continue to lead the world's economies or will we be overtaken? Will the world become safer or more dangerous? Will our military remain the strongest in the world? Will our children and grandchildren's future be brighter than ours?

My answer to you is yes. Yes, we will lead. Yes, we will prosper. Yes, we will be safer. Yes, we will pass on to our children a stronger, better country. But we must be prepared to act swiftly, boldly, with courage and wisdom.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I'm an American. You are Americans, and we choose to fight. Don't give up hope. Be strong. Have courage. And fight. [usa! usa!]

Fight for a new direction for our country. Fight for what's right for America.

Fight to clean up the mess of corruption, infighting and selfishness in Washington.

Fight to get our country and our economy out of the ditch and back in the lead.

Fight for the ideals and character of a free people.

Fight for your children's future.

Fight for justice and opportunity for all.

Stand up to defend our country from its enemies.

Stand up, stand up, stand up and fight. America is worth fighting for. Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history.

Now, let's go out win this election in PA and get this country moving again.

God bless you, god bless you all, and god bless the USA.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

CHUCK TODD: let me start with one of the issues that's likely to come up tonight at the debate, that's the issue of gun safety. last night in what the clinton campaign is referring to as a debate-eve conversion you came out in favor of essentially repealing immunity for gun manufacturers when it comes to being held liable for gun deaths. that's a switch of your positions. what brought you to this conclusion?

BERNIE SANDERS: well, not really. you know, i understand that secretary clinton and her campaign understand that, you know, they're losing ground. we've started this campaign off 359% in the poll at 3% in the polls, we're closing in in iowa and we're ahead in new hampshire. so i sense in the next few weeks you'll see more --

CHUCK TODD: but you did change your position on this.

BERNIE SANDERS: what i said several months ago, having a d-minus voting record from the nra, voting to ban assault weapons in 1988, yeah, that was a piece of legislation i wanted to relook at. but what that legislation had is a prohibition on armor-piercing bullets, it had language for a child lock safety for our kids, important provision. there were things i do not like and i was willing to rethink. we have rethought it. there's a bill apparently being introduced, i like that bill, it makes good changes and we will be supportive of it.

CHUCK TODD: another thing that will come up on the issue of gun safety is the issue of a waiting period. the clinton campaign is hitting you on not being supportive of something longer like a five day or seven day window and the reason this is being brought up is if dylann roof, the man who killed those nine folks in charleston last year, if there had been a longer waiting period he might have been prevented from buying a gun.

BERNIE SANDERS: look, what we saw in charleston is a tragedy of unspeakable dimensions. i did some pray a guy did prayer with people then takes out a gun and shoots nine people. i believe very strongly in instant background checks. i think we have to expand it and make sure 100% that we keep guns out of the hands of people who should not have that, people with criminal backgrounds, people who are mentally unstable. that has been my view from day one. but you know, chuck, i think the reason the clinton campaign is getting defense sieve they see that we have the momentum. they see the issues we are talking about, a disappearing middle-class and new income and going to the top 1%, a corrupt campaign finance system where people like secretary clinton can raise millions of dollars through super pacs. those are the issues they don't want to discuss so tonight we're going to be discussing a lot of issues and the main issues is why the rich get richer, almost everybody else gets poorer and the fact that we have got to stand up to the billionaire class and change those dynamics.

CHUCK TODD: so you're in in favor of a longer background check? a five, seven-day background check?

BERNIE SANDERS: we are willing to look at anything that makes sense, that keeps guns out of the hands of people who should not have them. but i'm not going to be defensive on that issue. i lost an election in 1988, probably lost an election because i had the courage back then to say assault weapons should not be sold in america.

CHUCK TODD: let me ask you quickly about the iran deal. is iran still an enemy of the united states given what's going on? the improved diplomatic relations?

BERNIE SANDERS: it's funny. if you think back to 2007 during the campaign in which secretary clinton ran against barack obama she was critical of him, a question was asked to obama and said "would you sit down and talk to the iranians?" and he said "yeah, i would." point bag in you talk to your adversaries, you don't run away from that. secretary clinton i think called him naive. turns out that obama was right so clearly we have many, many issues and many concerns with iran but clearly also we want to improve our relationship with this very powerful country. i think the agreement to make certain iran does not get a nuclear weapon was a huge step forward. the fact we have the prisoner release was a good important step forward. so i hope we can continue to go forward to improve relations with iran.

CHUCK TODD: senator sanders, i'll leave it there. we'll look forward to seeing you, secretary clinton and martin o'malley on stage on nbc thank you, sir. it's going to be a humdinger of a debate. you heard senator sanders there mentioned hillary clinton in almost every single answer.

LAST NIGHT'S EVENING NEWS

All three networks reported Donald Trump's controversial comments about whether John McCain is a war hero. NBC noted that Trump leads the latest Republican poll. Trump refused to apologize for his comments regarding McCain. Reporters claimed that John McCain served in the military while Trump avoided the draft. CBS interviewed Trump and he clarified that he doesn't want to run as an independent because running as a GOP candidate is the best way to win the presidency.

In Facebook Chat, Hillary Clinton Tells of Her Love of Pantsuits, and Jabs Her Rivals // NYT // Alan Rappeport – July 20, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton dished out some news on her philosophy of financial regulation, proclaimed her love of pantsuits and threw some jabs at her Republican rivals in her inaugural Facebook chat as a presidential candidate on Monday.

Showing her social media savvy, Mrs. Clinton expanded on her plans for holding Wall Street accountable and called for paying whistle-blowers more to come forward and speak out against corporate wrongdoing.

Mrs. Clinton also used the format to set the record straight on racial inequality, declaring unequivocally that "black lives matter." Her Democrat rivals, Senator Bernie Sanders and former Gov. Martin O'Malley, drew criticism after they seemed to hedge on the issue, but Mrs. Clinton said, "Everyone in this country should stand firmly behind that."

The former secretary of state also took the opportunity to bring up Donald J. Trump and try to make him the face of the Republican Party on immigration.

"Donald Trump in particular is getting a lot of attention for some hateful rhetoric, but Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio actually agree with him on denying a pathway to citizenship and consigning hardworking immigrants to second-class status," Mrs. Clinton said.

Mrs. Clinton's chat drew thousands of readers and while she was peppered with questions from reporters — "Do you feel responsible for the situation in Libya?" — she tended to mix policy answers with personal touches about subjects such as the plight of being a female road warrior and her wardrobe.

"I never met a pantsuit I didn't love," Mrs. Clinton said, pointing a fan to her online campaign store.

Clinton: Companies Fined for Wrongdoing Should Cut Executive Bonuses // WSJ // Laura Meckler – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner for president, said Monday that when corporations pay government fines for wrongdoing, the companies should reduce the bonuses of executives who "should have been accountable or should have caught the problem."

In a wide-ranging question-and-answer session on Facebook, Mrs. Clinton also proposed increasing rewards for whistleblowers at financial firms, and she explained why she thinks the capital gains rate should go up for short-term investments.

Her ideas come at a time when her challengers for the Democratic presidential nomination are promising big changes to Wall Street regulation, including reinstating rules that require that commercial and investment banking be separated. Mrs. Clinton doesn't plan to go that far, and is under pressure from the left to offer her own proposals.

Previewing a speech on Wall Street regulation slated for the coming weeks, Mrs. Clinton vowed to defend and expand the 2010 Dodd-Frank legislation regulating financial firms, and she repeated her promise to prosecute individuals as well as corporations for wrongdoing. Her remarks came ahead of Dodd-Frank's fifth anniversary Tuesday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We have work to do to enhance accountability," she wrote. "Even though some institutions have paid fines and even admitted guilt, too often it seems like the people responsible get off with limited consequences (or none at all)."

She said she also would "appoint and empower tough, independent-minded regulators" and give them resources to do their jobs.

In addition, Mrs. Clinton said award amounts for whistleblowers should be increased, to provide a greater incentive for employees to come forward amid high Wall Street pay levels. An aide said that the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery and Enforcement Act caps at $1.6 million the amount that an individual can receive for coming forward to the Justice Department to report wrongdoing. The aide said Mrs. Clinton is considering various approaches to requiring companies that are fined to cut executive bonuses and would offer details in the coming weeks.

On the capital gains tax, Mrs. Clinton confirmed a Journal report that later this week she will announce a proposal to revamp the tax so it hits short-term investors with higher rates. It is part of a package of measures designed to prod companies to put more emphasis on long-term growth.

She cited changes in corporate attitudes in explaining why she supports increasing the capital gains tax to rates higher than the 20% she backed in 2008. "The increase in short-termism has grown in urgency since 2008, and the urgency of our solutions has to match it," she wrote.

For investments held by top earners for a short time—perhaps two or three years—the rate would increase to more than 28% from 23.8%. When she ran for president in 2008, she said that the tax should not go above 20%, a point that some Republicans seized on Monday.

"Hillary Clinton's backtrack on her previous capital gains position is a blatant attempt to appease the liberal wing of her party that she is so desperate to win over," said Jeff Bechdel, communications director for the America's Rising PAC, a Republican group.

In her Facebook session, Mrs. Clinton also:

–Promised to offer policies aimed at making college more affordable. She said her ideas include allowing students to refinance debt so it is more affordable and encouraging more people to use a system that sets debt repayments as a percentage of income.

–Addressed a question that tripped up her rivals at the liberal Netroots Nation convention over the weekend. Asked what she would do to begin dismantling "structural racism" in the nation, she began her response by writing, "Black lives matter," a saying that's been adopted by activists. At a session earlier this year, she upset some when she said, "All lives matter," a phrase seen as diminishing the particular problems facing African-Americans.

She also repeated her calls for an overhaul of the criminal justice system, as well as for increasing money spent on early childhood education and for automatic voter registration.

–Repeated that an increase in people working in the "gig economy"—for companies such as Uber, though she didn't mention it by name—offers challenges and opportunities. She has come under some scrutiny for suggesting that the business models of these popular companies may diminish worker protections.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We have to resolve these questions while embracing the promise and potential of these new technologies and without stifling innovation or limiting the ability of working moms and veterans and young people to get ahead,” she said. She added that the Affordable Care Act has shown the importance of making sure workers have access to benefits.

–Praised the late South African leader Nelson Mandela as the “greatest person I’ve had the privilege of meeting.” She said he taught her the power of overcoming bitterness and hatred that “as he said, can keep you imprisoned even after you are let out.”

–Responded to a woman who said women suffer a “hair and makeup tax” because it takes them so much longer to get ready in the morning, and who asked how Mrs. Clinton manages to prepare for the day. “Amen, sister—you’re preaching to the choir,” she wrote. “It’s a daily challenge. I do the best I can —and as you may have noticed, some days are better than others!”

Here's How Hillary Clinton Says She Would Have Answered The 'Black Lives Matter' Protesters // HuffPo //
Amanda Terkel – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton attempted on Monday to distinguish her views on racial inequality from those of her Democratic presidential rivals, who drew boos from "Black Lives Matter" activists at a progressive conference over the weekend.

"Racial inequality is not merely a symptom of economic inequality," Clinton said when asked during a Facebook question-and-answer session how she would have responded to the protesters at Netroots Nation, an annual gathering of progressive activists.

While Clinton skipped the conference, her two main challengers for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, participated in a candidate forum on Saturday that was interrupted by protesters calling for criminal justice reform.

O'Malley was booed by the crowd when he said, "Black lives matter, white lives matter, all lives matter," and later apologized for seeming "insensitive" about police brutality toward the black community.

Sanders grew frustrated with the protesters and attempted to stick to his message of fighting economic injustice.

"Black lives of course matter. But I've spent 50 years of my life fighting for civil rights. If you don't want me to be here, that's okay," Sanders told the protesters Saturday, who chanted, "I want Bernie Sanders to say my name."

In Monday's Q&A, Clinton responded to a question about how she would have handled the protesters. Her response:

Of course, responding in a Facebook chat is much easier than actually facing down protesters in the moment. In 2009, former President Bill Clinton's appearance at Netroots Nation was also interrupted by a protester, who wanted him to account for his record on gay rights.

In late June, the former secretary of state similarly faced criticism for saying "all lives matter" while speaking at a black church, even though she had said "black lives matter" the previous year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The phrase "all lives matter" has been interpreted as pushback against "black lives matter," which became a rallying cry after the high-profile police killings of black men in places like Ferguson, Missouri.

Speaking about lessons she learned from her mother, Clinton said, "Her own parents abandoned her. By 14 she was out on her own, working as a housemaid. Years later, when I was old enough to understand, I asked her, 'What kept you going?' Her answer was very simple: Kindness along the way from someone who believed she mattered. All lives matter."

Around the same time, Sanders also said, "Black lives matter. White lives matter. Hispanic lives matter. But these are also not only police matters. They're not only gun control matters. They are significantly economic matters."

"Saying 'all lives matter' causes erasure of the differing disparities each group faces," The Huffington Post's Julia Craven explained last year, noting that police brutality disproportionately affects the black community. "Saying 'all lives matter' is nothing more than you centering and inserting yourself within a very emotional and personal situation without any empathy or respect."

Clinton didn't mention either O'Malley or Sanders in her response, although her line about racial inequality going beyond economic inequality seemed to be a dig at Sanders and his reaction to the protesters.

This story has been updated to include further information about Clinton's and Sanders' remarks in June.

Hillary Clinton bashes Wall Street, but only a little // WaPo // Anne Gearan – July 20, 2015

Government penalties for corporate wrongdoing should cut into the bonuses paid to executives who should have been accountable, and no one is "too big to jail," Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton said Monday.

During a lengthy question and answer session on Facebook, Clinton entered the political controversy over the protest phrase "black lives matter," which ensnared her closest competitor for the Democratic nomination over the weekend. She also cracked wise about her love of pantsuits and agreed with a woman questioner that professional women are held to different expectations for physical appearance than men that the questioner called a "hair and makeup tax."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Amen, sister,” Clinton responded. As with others in the Facebook back and forth, the message was signed “H,” to signify that she wrote it herself. Clinton’s Facebook page and Twitter account are managed by her campaign.

She managed to plug some campaign merchandise, too.

HRCchat1

Striking a note of outrage over Wall Street abuses that is keyed to appeal to liberal voters, Clinton pledged to go beyond current regulations if she is elected president, to prosecute individuals as well as financial firms. Whistleblowers should win higher awards for calling out malfeasance, she said.

“We've all heard the shocking stories of misconduct by individuals and institutions in the financial industry,” Clinton wrote. “And even though some institutions have paid fines and even admitted guilt, too often it seems like the people responsible get off with limited consequences (or none at all). Even when they’ve already pocketed the gains. That's wrong and it has to change.”

Clinton added that she will defend and seek to expand the 5-year-old set of financial industry controls known as Dodd-Frank, and accused Republicans of trying to undo the protection the legislation affords.

Her campaign said the whistleblower proposal refers to a $1.6 million federal cap on individual awards for exposing wrongdoing.

“While this represents a large sum in real dollars, it pales in comparison to pay levels within the financial sector and in comparison to whistleblower rewards offered under comparable anti-fraud statutes,” a campaign press release said. Clinton wants to “sharply” increase the amount that could go to whistleblowers, the campaign said, but there was no mention of a precise figure.

The proposals begin to fill in details of Clinton’s carefully calibrated economic platform. She is trying to place herself as a watchdog against corporate wrongdoing and what her allies claim is a dangerous hands-off approach advanced by Republicans. At the same time she is distancing herself from the Wall Street bashing that is buoying the underdog candidacy of challenger Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.)

"I pledged to prosecute individuals as well as firms when they commit fraud or other criminal wrongdoing - because no one is 'too big to jail,'" Clinton wrote. "I’ll be laying out my Wall Street agenda in more detail soon."

None of the proposals she has put forward so far appear close to the major crackdown on banking practices, financial loopholes and astronomical salaries favored by many liberals. Clinton is expected to fill in some details in a speech about corporate responsibility this week. Eventually she will have to address issues of income inequality more directly, and to answer liberal demands for a specific proposal to raise then minimum wage.

Clinton’s own longstanding ties to Wall Street, both as a New York senator and two-time Democratic presidential contender, have made her suspect in the eyes of some of the Democratic Party’s most liberal voters. Those voters wield particular influence now, when they can point up the shortcomings of the Democratic front-runner by backing a competitor or withholding support.

Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley were interrupted Saturday by protesters demanding to know what they would do about racial injustice. The heckling at the progressive political gathering Netroots Nation highlighted the divide between the vocal support for Sanders on issues surrounding economic opportunity and inequality and the Democrats' black and Hispanic voter bases.

Clinton skipped the gathering, which draws just the sort of progressive activists she's had trouble winning over, but weighed in on the hecklers' question in the Facebook exchange.

"Black lives matter," Clinton wrote. "Everyone in this country should stand firmly behind that. We need to acknowledge some hard truths about race and justice in this country, and one of those hard truths is that that racial inequality is not merely a symptom of economic inequality. Black people across America still experience racism every day."

O'Malley was nearly shouted down at the Netroots event for saying that "all lives matter," black and otherwise. He also addressed many of the protesters' concerns, but his choice of words angered many who saw it as dismissive.

Clinton had also been criticized for saying "all lives matter" during a political event in South Carolina last month.

Hillary Clinton's top goal as president could be effectively impossible to achieve // WaPo // Max Ehrenfreund – July 20, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton says the "defining economic challenge of our time" is raising incomes for working Americans, specifically for the middle class. It is no mystery why: Middle-class incomes have been stagnant for a generation and a half. Many Americans have not really benefited from an economic recovery that is now in its sixth year.

This week and the last, Clinton, a Democratic presidential candidate, has been outlining policies to address the challenge: setting a higher minimum wage, helping workers unionize, allowing new parents to take paid time off, among others.

But even if she wins the opportunity to try out these ideas during four or even eight years as president, factors beyond her control could make a meaningful increase in wages impossible for many Americans.

Some economists argue that forces, such as technological automation and globalization, have devalued moderately skilled labor and held down wages, particularly in manufacturing. Better education would mean more employment opportunities for Americans in the coming decades, but that would take, well, decades. So might reversing the long decline of organized labor. Some have even argued that the era of rapid technological advancement might be ending, meaning growth in incomes will be slower overall.

These are among the reasons that real, lasting middle-class wage growth -- the type experienced in the years after World War II and in the 1990s -- could be difficult or impossible to achieve over the next eight years.

Clinton's advisers say they recognize the challenge, but that it can be overcome.

Her campaign is "developing evidence-based policies that, taken together, would boost incomes, create a stronger and fairer economy, and set us on a path to sustainable long-term growth," Ian Sams, a spokesman, wrote in a statement, citing research by economists Alan Krueger, Raj Chetty, Heather Boushey and others.

Falling incomes are an urgent question for Clinton and other candidates for president. They've declined for the typical American household over the past 15 years, and they haven't kept pace with growth in the economy for decades.

Rich and poor shared the benefits of economic growth until about 40 years ago. That's about when American workers' wages suddenly stopped increasing, even though they were producing more and more, creating more revenue for their employers. There is debate among economists about why a rising tide no longer seems to lift all the boats.

Some argue that employers aren't hiring because they are relying more and more on machines to get things done. Others contend that on the contrary, meaningful technological progress has basically stopped, and that's why living standards are improving more gradually. And still others point to trade with China, which has created new competition for American labor.

Larry Mishel, president of the liberal Economic Policy Institute, dismisses these explanations as a way of avoiding what he says is the real problem. Workers have lost leverage over their bosses, and they're being paid less a result. "It's bargaining power," he said.

A stronger hand for workers was a theme of Clinton's proposals. She denounced past policies that had eroded the bargaining power of labor.

"The choices we make as a nation matter," Clinton said last Monday, "and the choices we make in the years ahead will set the stage for what American life in the middle class in our economy will be like in this century."

As president, though, Clinton's choices would be limited.

Clinton talked about rules to guarantee workers are paid for overtime and to prevent employers from misclassifying them as contractors. The Obama administration has already taken action on these issues, though.

She again proposed raising the federal minimum wage, but policymakers in many states and cities are a step ahead of Congress on the question.

Roughly three out of five workers are living in a jurisdiction with a minimum wage above the federal level. Last year, about 3 million workers received the federal minimum wage or less. That's a lot of people, but it's a small fraction of the national labor force.

Proponents predict that higher minimums would increase wages even for workers who are already earning more. Giving a minimum-wage worker a promotion and a raise could mean paying a wage above the minimum, and an increase could cascade up the scale this way. The Congressional Budget Office has predicted that an increase in the minimum wage would raise incomes slightly for the poor and the middle class, although the estimates were uncertain.

Clinton said the decline in union membership is another reason wages have improved little over the past four decades. The research shows that membership in a union increases a worker's income. And according to one estimate by Mishel and his colleagues, the decline in unions explains roughly a third of the increase in income inequality among American men between 1973 and 2007.

As president, though, Clinton would confront a major obstacle to restoring unions: the right-to-work laws that conservative governors such as Wisconsin's Scott Walker, another presidential candidate, have enacted in half the states.

Clinton also wants to require employers to offer new parents paid leave. Only about 12 percent of U.S. workers enjoy paid family leave, according to federal statistics.

Clinton hasn't yet detailed her ideas about paid leave, but the main proposal in Congress to establish paid leave would implement it with a 0.2 percent tax on payrolls, taking money from workers and returning it to them when they have children.

Paid leave funded this way could increase household incomes on the whole if it helped more mothers go back to work after having children. Yet in the developed world, more generous paid leave is associated with a larger gap between men's and women's earnings. That could be because mothers take advantage of paid leave more frequently than fathers in those countries, and the time off puts those women at an even greater disadvantage when they go back to work.

To be sure, one way to maximize wages is to have very low unemployment, and one way to do that would be looser monetary policy at the Federal Reserve. It's unclear how much more Clinton could achieve at the Fed, since the central bank is already led by an aggressive advocate for reducing unemployment, Janet Yellen.

And in any event, the fact that unemployment is already at 5.3 percent and wages have hardly increased at all raises questions about the future trajectory of incomes.

In practice, Congress is the most important limit on a president's economic influence. As Republicans are likely to remain in control of the House no matter what the outcome of the presidential election, Clinton would have to win their cooperation if she wanted to enact paid leave for parents or a higher minimum wage, or if she wanted to repeal state right-to-work laws through federal legislation.

There are a couple of areas in which Clinton and Republicans might be able to find common ground. Politicians in both parties have been calling for comprehensive tax reform, but the last major revision to the tax code -- in 1986 -- had very little aggregate effect on the economy, research suggests. And Congress started undoing it just a couple of years after it was passed.

The next Congress could also reform the immigration system and make new investments in public infrastructure. Clinton's aides argued that both would increase the incomes of ordinary Americans.

Still, some commentators have suggested that Clinton's agenda doesn't go far enough, and the only way to meaningfully increase incomes for the working class is to redistribute money to them by raising taxes on the wealthy.

For example, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), one of Clinton's competitors for the Democratic nomination, has suggested raising marginal tax rates on the highest incomes to 50 percent or more and expanding Social Security to help prepare workers for retirement.

Clinton has endorsed the idea of a minimum effective tax rate, but it seems unlikely that she'd propose major increases in taxes on the rich.

Any suggestion that some people might have to pay more taxes to support incomes for others can make Democrats uncomfortable, as Obama and his advisers discovered when the president began talking about inequality a couple of years ago. He soon abandoned the subject.

"The appetite for tax-and-transfer strategies, even among Democrats, much less among independents or Republicans, is probably somewhat limited," Obama recently told The New Yorker. The president explained that people worry that the burden of new taxes could fall on them and that the government would not use the money effectively, and stagnant incomes have made them even more skeptical of proposals for new revenue.

Obama's experience with how Democrats see the issue will be instructive for Clinton and her advisers if she wins the presidency and Republicans lose control of the House.

Hillary Clinton said it. Black lives matter. No hedge. // WaPo // Janell Ross – July 20, 2015

She said it. She really did. Actually she typed it. But still, there was no hedge.

In a live Facebook Q&A set up primarily for average people interested in asking Hillary Clinton questions, some reporters popped in too. Ok, a lot of reporters popped in, since Clinton hasn't exactly been too open about taking questions from reporters. Among the online attendees was the Post's own, Wesley Lowery. Lowery asked Clinton this question and got this response:

"Black lives matter." With those three little words, Clinton acknowledged that there are myriad ways that race continues to shape life in America that have almost no relationship to pocketbooks, educational credentials or class. There's ample evidence that income, education and the like do not deliver the same results in black lives that they do in others.

After three successive summers filled with news about the nation's rocky racial landscape, it's probably fair to say that at least some of the people running for office in 2016 expect questions about the way the police do their work and how the country responds when something goes wrong.

But for a group of activists who first organized loosely online under the hashtag #blacklivesmatter in the hours after a jury acquitted George Zimmerman on all charges in the death of unarmed, black teen, Trayvon Martin, just getting someone in the 2016 field -- especially the heavy favorite to be the Democratic nominee -- to acknowledge that black lives are in particular peril is pretty huge.

Of course, the journey from point A to point B has not been anything close to easy.

In June, Clinton went to a Missouri forum, held in a church not far from the place where another unarmed black teen was shot and killed by a police officer whom a grand jury later opted not to indict. At the time, she said this: "All lives matter."

It was, whether intentional or not, the phrase to which opponents of the Black Lives Matter movement have most often turned.

Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent from Vermont seeking the Democratic presidential nomination, has offered up his own assessment of the singular way that race shapes policing in the United States and the relationship between economic isolation and continued racial inequality.

But Sanders has also used that same phrase, "All lives matter," when pressed. And, this weekend, when activists in Phoenix deeply concerned with the way that police do their work in communities of color stormed into a liberal gathering, Sanders wasn't as forceful on the issue as Clinton.

"Black lives of course matter," he said. "But I've spent 50 years of my life fighting for civil rights. If you don't want me to be here, that's okay."

His I'll-just-take-my-ball-and-go-home comment, his irritated body language and decision to speak over protesters didn't do him any favors. There was no pivoting to his ideas around police or criminal justice reforms.

Apparently, all that wasn't enough to encourage former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley to shift course. In fact, O'Malley said this at the same gathering: "Black lives matter. White lives matter. All lives matter." He later apologized.

So, Hillary Clinton, habitual avoider of direct contact with reporters has said on the record: "Black lives matter." She didn't add qualifiers. She didn't hedge. That is indeed a moment worth noting.

And, perhaps a moment that came in the nick of time. Black Lives Matter groups from around the country are set to convene in Cleveland this weekend to talk tactics, platform and strategy.

Could the economy boost Hillary's presidential hopes? // WaPo // Greg Sargent – July 20, 2015

So what's going to happen in the 2016 election? Will the economy help or hurt the incumbent party? Will this campaign be about the economy or national security?

For purposes of gaming this out, the most important piece of the weekend is this one from the New York Times' Neil Irwin, in which he talks to a range of economists about what the economy will look like on Election Day 2016:

They said they believed that unemployment would be the lowest it has been during an election since George W. Bush and Al Gore faced off in 2000, when it stood at 3.9 percent. The median forecast for the unemployment rate when voters go to the polls in November 2016 was 4.8 percent (which would be down from 5.3 percent last month). They saw only a 15 percent chance of a recession starting by next Election Day. Interest rates, inflation and gasoline prices should all be a bit higher than they are now, they said, while staying quite low by historical standards...

On its face, all of that points to an election with dynamics similar to 1988 or 2000, when the nominee of the incumbent party (George H. W. Bush in 1988 and Mr. Gore in 2000) could promise continued prosperity. That bodes well for the Democratic nominee, though as Mr. Gore's loss despite winning the popular vote shows, even a favorable economy doesn't assure victory, given the workings of the Electoral College.

But here's one key caveat:

Their consensus was 2.8 percent growth in average hourly wages in the 12 months before the election, slightly higher than the 2 percent rise in prices. That implies that the weak spot of the Obama economy, in compensation for ordinary workers, will remain that way heading into 2016.

Thus, even if unemployment is low, wages could continue to stagnate. Yet this, too, could favor Clinton — though that's anything but assured — and this gets at why this projection has direct relevance to the present political moment.

We now know that both major party nominees will agree that stagnant wages and stalled economic mobility are among the major problems facing the country. But we also know that the two parties will differ dramatically on what to do in response. Hillary Clinton has already telegraphed an ambitious agenda premised on the idea that these problems are defining challenges, and that we have the choice of doing something about them, via a robust, interventionist governmental response. As Paul Krugman has noted, Clinton's public statements signal that "there's now an effective consensus among Democrats" that "workers need more help, in the form of guaranteed health insurance, higher minimum wages, enhanced bargaining power, and more."

By contrast, all signs are that the GOP nominee will remain generally wedded to the idea that the solution to those problems is generating more growth, and that the way to do that, and to ensure wider distribution of the fruits of that growth, is by getting government out of the way and cutting taxes for everyone, including top earners.

This may not prove a winning contrast for Republicans. And so, if the economic argument in 2016 is fought around a general public sense that the economy is improving but that the gains of the recovery are not achieving widespread enough distribution, I'd say that probably favors Clinton. But that's hardly guaranteed — after all, Republicans might succeed in blaming stagnant wages on Dem policies while campaigning for "change." And, of course, even if this argument does end up favoring Clinton, it still might not be enough for her to win.

* CLINTON TO ROLL OUT NEW TAX PROPOSAL: Here's an example of the above, courtesy of the Wall Street Journal:

Clinton will propose a revamp of capital-gains taxes that would hit some short-term investors with higher rates, part of a package of measures designed to prod companies to put more emphasis on long-term growth, a campaign official said. The proposal, to be laid out in a speech later this week, is one of a number of ideas designed to tackle what Mrs. Clinton, some economists and some on Wall Street consider the overly short-term focus of corporate strategy.

It's still unlikely that Clinton will embrace inequality proposals as ambitious as Elizabeth Warren and/or Bernie Sanders, but this signals a robust agenda that includes combating the impact of "short-termism" on the economy.

* NATIONAL SECURITY OFFICIALS GIVE IRAN DEAL A BOOST: Dozens of former national security officials from previous administrations have signed a joint statement, coordinated by the Iran Project, that endorses the Iran deal. One key bit:

We acknowledge that the JCPOA does not achieve all of the goals its current detractors have set for it. But it does meet all of the key objectives. Most importantly, should Iran violate the agreement and move toward building nuclear weapons, it will be discovered early and in sufficient time for strong countermeasures to be taken to stop Iran. No agreement between multiple parties can be a perfect agreement without risks. We believe without this agreement, the risks to the security of the U.S. and its friends would be far greater.

Meanwhile, Secretary of State John Kerry went on all the Sunday shows to make the point that if Congress blocks the deal, that, too, will have all kinds of unpleasant consequences.

* INTRA-GOP WAR LOOMS IN CONGRESS: Politico reports that conservatives in Congress are preparing for war over an expected push by GOP leaders to link re-authorization of the Ex-Im Bank (which conservatives opposes as "crony capitalism") and a short-term replenishment of the Highway Trust Fund:

The majority of these hard-line members are opposed to any highway deal that would reauthorize the bank's charter and have indicated to GOP leadership not to count on their votes — which could force Speaker John

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Boehner, who has praised the bank as essential to job growth, to turn to House Democrats for votes on a final highway package.

Sound familiar? It's another reminder that things will get very contentious in Congress again, particularly with spending bills and the votes on the Iran deal looming.

* GOP DONORS HOLDING BACK: The New York Times analyzes GOP fundraising and finds that many of the party's top donors are taking a wait-and-see approach:

Only about a fifth of the 1,000 or so fund-raisers and their spouses who rallied around Mitt Romney, the Republican nominee in 2012, have given money to any of the 2016 candidates....Some of the bundlers and donors said they had held back, in part, because the field was the strongest they had seen in years, with several viable contenders representing the party's different generational and ideological segments.

This boosts the stakes for coming GOP debates, where donors will get to see candidates perform under pressure, and is a reminder that we may not get a GOP frontrunner for many months.

* JEB BUSH TO PROPOSE LOBBYING BAN: The Washington Examiner reports that Jeb Bush will propose a six-year ban on lobbying by former elected officials, saying this in a speech today:

"If I am elected president, I will use all of my influence to enact into law an immediate, unequivocal six-year ban on lobbying — a full Senate term — for ex-members of the House and Senate."

Bush will likely root this proposal in a broader critique of government-as-the-problem, but the "revolving door" between the Capitol and K-Street is often attacked by liberals, too. Hillary Clinton will also probably offer a set of reforms designed to make Washington work better.

* U.S. AND CUBA RESTORE DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS: The Associated Press reports that Secretary of State John Kerry will appear at a news conference today with his Cuban counterpart to mark the formal beginning of restored diplomatic relations, after a half century of Cold War hostility.

The GOP presidential candidates will likely condemn what they are seeing, making this another area in which 2016 will be fought around the proper extent of U.S. international engagement under the next president, along with Iran and climate change.

* AND KASICH-MENTUM RAGES ACROSS THE LAND: John Kasich will announce his presidential candidacy this week, and E.J. Dionne takes stock of the Ohio governor, noting that he is very conservative on a range of issues, from the estate tax to his failed effort to roll back public employee bargaining rights.

But as Dionne also notes, Kasich expanded Medicaid, outrageously suggesting he has a moral obligation to help poor people. This could prove just as problematic among conservative voters as has Jeb Bush's suggestion that the plight of undocumented immigrants is a morally complex one. How Kasich explains this will be worth watching.

Silicon Valley prefers Hillary // WaPo // Elise Viebeck – July 20, 2015

Despite bursts of Republican outreach to the tech world, Silicon Valley still prefers Hillary Clinton to GOPers like Jeb Bush or Rand Paul. "Clinton's campaign in the second quarter counted big checks from a variety of tech executives, including Facebook Chief Operating Officer Sheryl Sandberg, Google Chief Internet Evangelist Vint Cerf, YouTube leader Susan Wojcicki and Tesla CEO Elon Musk, according to a fundraising report filed this week. Sandberg, Cerf and Wojcicki each gave $2,700, while Musk gave $5,000," Politico reported.

"Bush, Marco Rubio and Rand Paul collected just a handful of donations from Valley elite. The Republicans did receive support from many lower-level Silicon Valley employees, particularly Paul, who attracted a large number of small dollar donations."

Hillary Clinton Cites Corporate 'Short-Termism' in Call for Capital Gains Tax Overhaul // WSJ // Laura Meckler – July 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton cited changes in corporate attitudes Monday in explaining why she supports increasing the capital gains tax to rates higher than those she backed in 2008.

In a Facebook question and answer session, Mrs. Clinton confirmed that later this week she will announce a proposal to revamp capital-gains taxes to promote long-term investment, as The Wall Street Journal reported Monday. Aides said the proposal would mean that short-term investors would face higher rates. It is part of a package of measures designed to prod companies to put more emphasis on long-term growth.

She wrote that her goal will be to "promote long-term investment that will strengthen companies, workers, and communities."

"Both business leaders and labor leaders have been speaking out about this in recent years," she said. "The increase in short-termism has grown in urgency since 2008, and the urgency of our solutions has to match it."

For investments held by top earners for a short time—perhaps two or three years—the rate would increase to more than 28% from 23.8%. When she ran for president in 2008, she said that the tax should not go above 20%, a point that some Republicans seized on Monday.

"Hillary Clinton's backtrack on her previous capital gains position is a blatant attempt to appease the liberal wing of her party that she is so desperate to win over," said Jeff Bechdel, communications director for the Republican America's Rising PAC.

Hillary Clinton to propose increasing capital gains taxes as part of 2016 campaign plans // AP // Lisa Lerer – July 20, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton plans later this week to propose raising capital gains taxes for some investors, part of a larger campaign effort to encourage greater focus on longer-term economic growth rather than more immediate gains for investors.

The new rates would be pegged to the duration of the investment, with short-term holdings taxed at a higher percentage.

Earlier this year, President Barack Obama proposed raising the 23.8 percent capital gains rate to 28 percent for the highest earners. While Clinton's proposal is still being finalized, her rate would likely be higher than Obama's for the shortest-held investments, according to a campaign official who spoke anonymously to discuss plans still being developed. Currently, gains on securities held for more than a year are taxed at the same rate as those held for decades.
